I want to make this prediction. If the proposed treaty goes through in its present form history will repeat itself in a measure. The farmer was just coming into his own, so to speak. He was improving his farm, notably his buildings and fences, and building up the soil by tile drainage and other ways. In order to keep pace with the Canadian farmer, he will have to return to a system of robbing the soil if he succeeds in profitably meeting this new competition.

CONSUMERS.

What is the necessity for this legislation that we are now considering? We are told that it is in the interests of the consumer, that they may have cheaper food products. The farmer is told that by removing the duties on farm products the price will not be decreased. And the consumer is also told that by reducing the duty on farm products the cost of living will be cheaper. Are both of these statements correct? It is evident to me that if the duty on farm products is removed the same will be decreased in price, but I am not sure, nor do I believe, that the consumer is to get relief because of the prices which the farmer may receive for his products, nor do I believe it was on account of the tariff. During the last campaign the Republicans and some Democrats frankly told their audiences that the high cost of living was world-wide and that it was not traceable to the tariff, for if it were, why were they suffering from the high cost of living in free-trade England? A careful examination of this matter will disclose that the consumer has been paying high prices traceable, notably in many cases, to freight rates, cold storage, and middlemen.

I want to quote from the report of Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, 1910, page 19:

"High prices was one of the subjects of my annual report for 1909. It was shown that for many years previous to about 1897, or a little later, the prices of farm products received by farmers were even less than the cost of production, and often little, if any, above that cost, so that during a long period of years the farmer was not thriving. It was shown also that in the upward price movement, which began about 1897, the prices received by the farmer have advanced in greater degree than those received by nearly all other classes of producers. That this should have been so was merely a matter of justice to the farmer to equalize the reward of his efforts with the rewards received in other lines of production."

On page 25 and following of the same report, he says:

"NO GROUND FOR COMPLAINT AGAINST THE FARMER.

"From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer, the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays.

"PROBLEM FOR CONSUMERS, AND NOT FARMERS, TO REMEDY.

"After consideration of the elements of the matter it is plain that the farmer is not getting an exorbitant price for his products, and that the cost of distribution from the time of delivery at destination by the railroad to delivery to the consumer is the feature of the problem of high prices which must present itself to the consumer for treatment."

The high cost of living can not be traced to the farm, as statistics prove that the farmer receives less than 40 per cent of what the consumer pays for his product.

In this connection I want to say that the high cost of living is too often mistaken for the cost of high, and many times, extravagant living.

I want to give a recent experience of a farmer friend living in Ingham County, in my district, who, while visiting in Lansing, was asked to go to market and purchase a bushel of potatoes. At the market he witnessed the grocer purchase from a farmer a load of potatoes at 25 cents per bushel, and no sooner had they been unloaded from the wagon than the grocer charged the visitor 50 cents per bushel. I am not complaining at what the grocer received, but I do want to ask in all fairness, when you consider the time, trouble, and expense to which the farmer was put in raising and marketing those potatoes, at 25 cents per bushel—and I do not know how many miles he drew them to market—as compared with the labor and expense of the merchant, will it be claimed for a single moment that the farmer received an unfair price for his potatoes? Yet the consumer in this instance paid twice what the farmer received, and there were no freight rates and only one middle man.

Also from an honored constituent of mine whose letter was received some weeks ago, who says:

"I think the duty on potatoes is 25 cents per bushel. They are selling here at New Hudson for 30 cents per bushel. They are mostly put into sacks costing 7½ cents each, or 3 cents per bushel; the cost of sacking is 2 cents per bushel; commission for the dealer here is 5 cents per bushel; so you see, loaded on the car at New Hudson here the cost is 40 cents per bushel; now add the railroad freight, say to Detroit, about 4 cents per bushel; cartage and commission by commission merchant we will say is 6 cents more; this makes a total cost of 50 cents per bushel in the hands of the commission merchant in Detroit.

"The retailer buys of him at 50 cents per bushel, and we will say, to be conservative, he retails them at 15 cents per peck, or 60 cents per bushel, and many of them make 5 pecks out of a bushel, and that would mean 75 cents per bushel to the consumer. So you see the tariff on this one product at the present time does not cut much figure; but remove the duty, and if Canada has a large supply it would glut the market and they would be practically worth nothing. One of the great questions now is, How can we eliminate these middle men—potatoes selling for two and one-half times what the farmer receives?"

Without wearying you, I want to add the views of another constituent who has expressed himself in no uncertain terms:

"The boy who studies geography will tell you that the greatest populations exist in the Northern States, and there are above the Mason and Dixon line three-fourths of the population of the Union. Now, this market is to be open to the rich agricultural lands of Canada; agricultural lands with $1-a-day labor against $2-a-day labor in the States, and more often, counting the board, $2.50 per day than $2. If the people wish to rob the Union of $2,000,000,000 yearly, they could have taken it from the Treasury, but the people in favor of this reciprocity treaty rob the people of the United States of this immense sum and more besides. As the agricultural lands of the Middle West and Eastern States were already on the decline and but lately on the advance, it means, with cheaper agricultural produce, these lands will not only go back in price but also in cultivation, and, in the end, subject to the better agricultural lands of Canada with its cheap labor. After this has been accomplished, it will take a quarter of a century to rebuild our lands, due to the beauty of the forensic popular orator.

"The present high prices of our produce are due to excessive freight rates. A car at New York market quotations to-day for No. 2 timothy hay at $18 per ton, taking out $5.50 freight, $1 commission, $1 for the local dealer profits, $1.25 for pressing, leaves the farmer $8.75; No. 1 timothy hay on to-day's market $15 would leave the farmer $9.25 after the farmer runs in debt for his farm, pays 6 per cent interest, pays his hired help, and taxes. Now, behold the beautiful angel of reciprocity. Canada comes in with an enormous crop and $4 a ton off, and the farmer has the munificent price, based on New York market to-day, of $4.75 for No. 2 timothy hay and $2.25 for No. 1 mixed, to pay interest, hired help, taxes, and live off of. It is a beautiful thing to enrich the farmer of Canada, open up the greatest market on earth, deplete our country of money, and reduce farm property one-third, if not more. This is all due to the great statesmanship of our leading politicians who, to favor a certain element, have advanced it. The laboring man repeats: 'Why, things will be cheaper.' But he wants to bear in mind that if the farmer makes no money, the market for the manufacturers is one-third to one-half gone. This means many a laboring man will be turned away, and even if eggs are 5 cents a dozen and butter 10 cents a pound, a soup with a lemon must do for him. The selfishness of people is apparent. The laboring man has been getting good wages, but he wants more. He wants the agricultural lands to deliver the produce he eats to his door free of cost. The advocates of reciprocity repeat that in years to come the matter will readjust itself.

"Why all this agitation for years; why a turmoil; why not leave well enough alone? The present good prices of farm products have done wonderful things. The people have gone back to the farms, finding a profit there where before there was none. The soil has become better, the latest and best implements of cultivation have been purchased, and the reliance on foreign lands to produce practically not needed. Twelve years ago, when hay was let in free, the farmer got $3 to $6 per ton for his hay (buyers lost money at that), 12 cents to 17 cents a pound for butter, and 10 cents a dozen for his eggs, and the result was—he left the farm.

"If you want free trade for agricultural products, then the farmer wants free trade for manufactured articles. The idea of shouldering on the farmer the weight of the opulent and trusts, the excessive freight rates, and let the merry manufacturing goat go free, as protected by a high tariff wall, is certainly the height of unfairness. If the price of farm produce was unnecessarily high and our lands could not produce the amount needed for the masses, then we had better have reciprocity. But at present—butter, 17 cents to 25 cents; eggs, 17 cents a dozen; flour becoming normal and meat on the decline; $9 to $10 a ton for No. 1 timothy hay; rye straw worth $10, delivered, New York City—how much cheaper do you want the farmer to go and live? Let us look at the other side of it. Farm implements higher; all manufactured goods higher, amounting from $2 to $4 a suit; linens and cotton goods out of sight; coal higher; freight rates higher; shoes higher; wages 10 years ago $1 per day, now $2 to $2.50 per day. Still the people high in office want to make a great swat at agriculture and prate great things, but they are not telling the people that their cost of living has been due more to excessive freight rates to pay dividends on watered stock, on manufactured goods and protection of trusts, who have raised the prices of every manufactured commodity. This would not do at all. The people who have the money blind the rest with their great ideas of benevolence at the expense of the agricultural community. There is not one single good idea in reciprocity at present, and certainly none in the future, unless a famine should strike the country."

I want to give you now a practical illustration of what has been occurring and is now occurring right here in Washington, and where five middlemen are employed before the consumer gets his products from the producer.

I am indebted to Mr. C. Louis Allen, president of the Cooperative Commercial Orchards of Virginia, for the same. Mr. Allen is known to some of the Members of this body, and especially to the Members from his own State, and he is a man of high character and standing. At the present time he is the owner of an apple orchard in Montana with 7,200 trees, and who, by reason of his experience, believes that the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia is one of the best fields in this country for apple orchards. I have said this much of him that you may know who he is, and that what he has to say in this connection ought to have weight, and I suppose his statement could be verified and duplicated over and over again, not only with reference to apples, but with practically everything else, that is the product of the farm, which clearly shows that the charge which is so often made that the farmer is receiving too much for his products is not true, when it can be shown that from two to five middlemen, with other causes, are the ones who have brought the high cost of living to the doorway of the consumer.

Mr. Allen says:

"A few figures which show how little of the apple consumer's dollar really goes to the producer. The original letters from the growers mentioned are on file in my office.

"F. S. Dunham, of Chelan, Wash., received 88½ cents a box for Jonathans, which were sold by the fruit dealer at the corner of Fourteenth and G Streets NW., Washington, D. C., for $4 a box.

"G. B. Kinney, of Peshastian, Wash., received $1.52 a box for apples which were sold in this city for 75 cents a dozen.

"W. B. Wright, of Peshastian, Wash., received $1.52 a box for apples which cost the Washington City retailer $3.25 a box, and which he sold for $4.50 a box.

"S. M. Neher, of Wenatchee, Wash., was paid $1.41 a box for apples which were sold to Washington City consumers at 10 cents each, three for 25 cents.

"The first middle man in these transactions is the local fruit growers' association.

"The second, the commission merchant in New York City, such as Steinhart & Kelley and Rae & Hatfield.

"The third, a broker, such as Samuel Haynes, of New York.

"The fourth, the local wholesale dealer here in Washington City, like Mr. Engel; he gets his apples by local freight from New York.

"The fifth, the local Italian fruit dealer or groceryman is the fifth middle man to sell the apples to the consumer."

Secretary Wilson asks this pertinent question:

"Why do not consumers buy directly from the farmers? A distribution of farm products in this simple way has already begun in England, where cooperative organizations of farmers are selling by direct consignment to cooperative organizations of consumers in cities.

"Farmers cooperative selling associations are numerous in this country, but cooperative buying associations among the people of cities and towns are few. Aside from buying associations, maintained by farmers, hardly any exist in this country. It is apparent, therefore, that the consumer has much to do to work out his own salvation with regard to the prices that he pays. Potatoes were selling last spring, in some places where there has been overproduction, for 20 cents, and in some places for even 9 cents per bushel at the farm, while at the same time city consumers in the East were paying 50 cents to 75 cents per bushel, although there was nothing to prevent them from combining to buy a carload or more of potatoes directly from the grower and for delivery directly to themselves."

I am sure that further comment is unnecessary as to the prices which the farmer receives for his products.

An urgent appeal is being made to the toiling masses of the cities, and they are told that through the adoption of this treaty the cost of living will be greatly reduced. They are not told that the products from the farm required for the daily needs of the average family do not form the principal cost of living, and that for every dollar which the laboring man spends for products from the farm which come to his table, he spends five times that amount for the actual necessities of life.

I wish I could say to the great multitude of consumers in cities and villages that I believed that the enactment of the treaty into law would benefit them, but I do not. Grant that it will cheapen food prices for the sake of the argument, but you must not forget that it may bring about conditions like we had a few years ago, when it mattered not how cheap things were, you could not get them for yourself and family, for you could not sell your labor with which to buy the necessities of life.

I can not but regard this treaty as one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been presented to Congress for many years.

The people of the cities and villages in some localities seem to have an eye single only to their own selfish interests, losing sight of the fact that when the farmer prospers it is a pretty sure index that everybody else is prospering. I regret to say some manufacturers, still protected by a tariff averaging about 40 per cent, are redoubling their efforts to have this treaty ratified.

I have been diligent in searching for the best definition for reciprocity, but I never knew before that reciprocity means giving something for nothing. You, upon the other side of the Chamber, claim that reciprocity is an original Democratic principle, and that the Republicans have taken it from you. If this is Democratic reciprocity, I hope you will take it and make the most of it; but I warn you, like the Wilson-Gorman bill, it will come back to plague you.

A word further to our friends upon the other side of the Chamber. The slogan of your party for years has been that you are a party for "tariff for revenue only"—a tariff that will not give special protection and advantages to special classes, and thus build up in this country great monopolies and unwarranted special interests.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. UNDERWOOD, has introduced H. R. 4413, commonly known as the farmers' free-list bill. You say you are going to pass it. This applies to the whole world, which means that, so far as Canada is concerned, at least, you are willing to abandon the principle of tariff for revenue only with reference to the articles mentioned in this free-list bill.

Now, I want to invite you, as an evidence of your sincerity and good faith, to offer an amendment to this bill, treaty, pact, agreement, or whatever you choose to call it, and pass it in that form. You can do it, for you have 63 majority, and you will get some votes from this side of the Chamber. Please do not make the excuse that this is not a bill, but a treaty, and that you can not do it, or that this treaty or agreement is so sacred that it can not be amended.

There are those of us who feel that before the proposed treaty is enacted into law it should be substantially amended, and it seems that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who, during the last session of Congress and for some years previous was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, entertained similar views and evidently felt the necessity, as well as the fairness, of having the agreement amended. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14, this year, page 2520, I find the following:

"Mr. CLARK. I wish to suggest to my party fellows that if this bill is passed [and that is the bill which is now under consideration] it is not the end of the chapter or the end of the world. At high noon on the 4th of March we shall come into the possession of this House, and if this treaty does not go as far as we want it to go, we can then make it go still further. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

"Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman says his party will come into power after the 4th of March.

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the House.

"Mr. DALZELL. Suppose this treaty does not pass at this session of Congress. What will his party do with it if it is put up to them at the next session of Congress?

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.' [Laughter and applause.]

"Mr. DALZELL. Would you pass this bill?

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think we would amend it and pass it."

So he did have in mind that it should be amended and many others are of the same opinion. But we are told when we make any suggestions of this nature that it would vitiate the agreement, and that to change it in any manner or form would prevent the acceptance of it by the Canadian Parliament. Well and good; let that be as it may. Are we more concerned in legislating for Canada, for whose people I entertain the greatest respect, who pay no taxes here and who are in no way interested in our Government, or are we legislating for our own people? But to show you that we are entirely warranted in making such amendments as we feel in right and justice ought to be made to the same, I want to quote from the same date and page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had to say in this connection. The gentleman from Massachusetts was addressing a question to Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and said:

"Is the gentleman aware that when the reciprocity treaty was arranged between France and Canada in 1907 to 1909 that, as a matter of fact, the French Senate did amend the treaty in a very important respect and that Canada promptly came to terms?

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That might be. I do not say that Canada would not come to terms.

"Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then it will not destroy the agreement.

"Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not say that Canada would not come to terms if we changed it and I do not say we would not come to terms if Canada changed it, but what I do say is that if either one of us changes it it must go back to the commissioners again, and that is an endless-chain performance that I have no use for."

In view of the manifest discrimination and unfairness of the treaty, it does seem to me that we are fully warranted in making at least one trial, as did the French, to amend this bill.

In the name of thousands of farmers in my district who, in the main, without regard to party, are strongly opposed to the passage of this treaty in its present form, and in behalf of the millions of farmers in this country, who are entitled to be accorded the same treatment as manufacturers and others, I protest against the adoption of this treaty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, it is entirely fitting that the debate on this measure, which is likely to prove the beginning of a revolution to free the people from industrial bondage, should be in progress this day, April 19, the one hundred and thirty-sixth anniversary of the Battle of Lexington and Concord, that marked the beginning of the American Revolution and was the first fight for national freedom.

This is Patriot's Day, a legal holiday in Massachusetts, as it should be throughout the Union. This is also patriots' day in the House, and may the battle here result as gloriously as the memorable one in 1775.

Some of the new Members of the House who have spoken on this most important subject have felt obliged to apologize for doing so. It does not appear to me, as one of the new Members, necessary to do so, for it is my firm belief that it was the desire of the people of this country to see enacted just such legislation as this bill proposes that resulted in so many new Members being elected to this Congress. They sent us here to help by voice and vote make changes in legislation that will bring relief from the burden of trust rule that has enriched the few at the cost of the great mass of the people.

There is not time in the few minutes allowed me, nor desire after the able presentations of the general benefits of this reciprocity pact that have been made, to go into a lengthy discussion of this bill. I simply desire to show to those who appear to be so solicitous about the farmers; who believe, or, at least, say that farmers have not had opportunity to know what this agreement means; who state that the farmers are unorganized and helpless, how the farmers of Connecticut, a New England State, almost a border State, feel and act about it.

In the Connecticut Legislature, now in session, are 94 members who are farmers. They have there and have had for several sessions a farmers' club or association, to which only those making farming their business can belong. They hold stated meetings during the session, at which all matters affecting farmers, directly or indirectly, are considered carefully. They have faithful and competent officers and an executive committee who keep watch of all legislation of interest to them when introduced and during committee stages. They know their business and know it well.

A resolution was introduced in the present session of the Connecticut Legislature indorsing this reciprocity bill when it was before the last Congress, scarcely more than a month ago, and it passed the house, in which there are more than 90 farmer members, without a dissenting vote and passed the senate with only 6 votes in opposition. That is the record of the Republican Legislature of Connecticut and its farmers' association. [Applause.]

This is not a partisan question, in my opinion. I do not care if it is. I do not care whether you call it a Republican measure or a Democratic measure. The fact that it was arranged on the part of this country by a Republican President makes no difference to me. It is a measure along Democratic lines; is in accord with Democratic campaign promises that are being kept; is in accord with Republican campaign promises that were not kept.

It is a measure that the people of this country, irrespective of political belief, are demanding for their relief, and any party that may be responsible for its defeat will have to suffer the consequences.

Good Republicans, basing support on party lines, can vote for it because it has the Republican President for its sponsor.

Good Democrats can vote for it because it has the indorsement of two party caucuses and the record of years of advocacy. All can and should vote for it, because it is right and calculated to be of benefit to the country at large. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of B. F. Jackson, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Thursday, April 20, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 258) for the relief of Thomas W. Best; Committee on Agriculture discharged, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. 742) for the relief of the survivors of the shipwreck of the steamboat Sultana; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 6080) granting pensions to widows of soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH: A bill (H. R. 6081) to amend the act approved March 23, 1906, entitled "An act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 6082) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Bath, in the State of New York; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 6083) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6084) amending section 1608 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to amend chapter 55 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia,'" approved February 23, 1905; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 6085) providing for the discontinuance of the grade of post noncommissioned staff officer and creating the grade of warrant officer in lieu thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COX of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 6086) to provide for the erection of a public building at Middletown, Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PEPPER: A bill (H. R. 6087) granting pensions to members of the military organization of 1862, known as "Squirrel Hunters"; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 6088) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCULLY: A bill (H. R. 6089) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 6090) to further amend an act to amend an act to amend section 4400, title 52, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam vessels, approved August 2, 1882, and also to amend section 4414, title 52, of the Revised Statutes, "Regulation of steam vessels," approved March 1, 1895; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6091) to extend the provisions of the existing bounty-land laws to the officers and enlisted men, and the officers and men of the boat companies, of the Florida Seminole Indian War; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6092) authorizing the Secretary of War to grade and fill certain ponds and lowlands on the military reservation at or near Fort Taylor, Key West, Fla., and to appropriate money therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6093) providing for the marking and protection of the battlefield known as "Dade's massacre," in Sumter County, Fla., and for the erection of a monument thereon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6094) increasing the pensions of those now receiving or entitled to pensions under the acts of Congress approved July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1902; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRISON of New York: A bill (H. R. 6095) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes relating to limitations in criminal cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 6096) in relation to claims arising under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property acts, and for other purposes, and to amend and revive the same; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COX of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 6097) to amend an act to compel officers and employees traveling in the interest of the Government to file a verified itemized sworn statement of their travel allowance with heads of departments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 6098) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River from a point in Dunklin County, Mo., to a point in Clay County, Ark.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LEWIS: Resolution (H. Res. 108) for investigation of plans of organization and system of deliberative divisions in vogue in foreign parliaments, with a view to maintaining the deliberative functions of such bodies and the privilege of individual members to participate in legislation during its formative stages; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. SAUNDERS: Resolution (H. Res. 109) to investigate the Post Office Department and service; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

By Mr. SIMS: Resolution (H. Res. 110) authorizing Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to prepare certain index in relation to advances in rates by carriers; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. BERGER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 71) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 6099) for the relief of Charles S. Kelley; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 6100) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Bloom; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6101) granting an increase of pension to Adolph Billhardt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6102) granting an increase of pension to Joseph A. Beach; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6103) granting an increase of pension to James Beistle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6104) granting an increase of pension to Michael G. Clapsaddle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6105) granting an increase of pension to George D. Edgeton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6106) granting an increase of pension to Henry Ennis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6107) granting an increase of pension to William Hill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6108) granting an increase of pension to David Henderson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6109) granting an increase of pension to John Herndon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 2.

Resolved by the Senate of the Eighteenth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Members of the Congress of the United States for the State of Colorado be, and they hereby are, requested to advocate in the Sixty-second Congress the time-honored principle of a tariff for revenue only, in that they demand an immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties; that articles in competition with trust-controlled products be placed upon the free list, and material reductions be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and graduate reductions be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis and render it impossible for private monopolies to find shelter behind high protective duties, whereby they are enabled to make combinations in restraint of honest trade and to raise the prices of the necessities of life to the American consumer; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be entered of record of the general assembly and copies be forwarded to the Representatives of Colorado in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 24.

Resolved by the senate, the house concurring, That the governor is hereby authorized and requested to protest His Excellency President William H. Taft against his approval of the Weeks bill, passed by the United States Senate on February 15 and now before the President for his approval or veto, as in the opinion of the General Assembly of Colorado such bill, if it becomes a law, would be inimical to the best interests of the West, as set forth in the senate joint memorial No. 11, which passed the senate on February 13, to which reference is hereby made.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Senate joint memorial 11.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent:

(a) That upon April 23, 1909, this body memorialized you, setting forth the injury and injustice inflicted upon the State through the maintenance and the administration methods of the forest reserves within its exterior borders and praying for relief therefrom.

(b) That such prayer has not been granted, nor any indication afforded of its favorable consideration.

(c) That, to the contrary, the officials of the Forest Service have, since that date, undertaken to correct the boundaries of the reserves, and while having caused the elimination of certain of those lands, contemporaneous with such proceedings, they have selected, designated, and recommended the addition of other lands—very largely strictly non-forest lands—far in excess of the eliminations, and which would thereby effect a net enlargement of the forest reserves within the State.

(d) That the President, in his message of December 6, 1906, recommended—

"That the limitation now imposed upon the Executive which forbids his reserving more forest lands in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and Wyoming be repealed."

This, presumably, for the purpose of acting upon those recommendations and adding such lands to the reserves.

We feel justified in this conclusion by the evidence of his having so proceeded in the Territories, where the said act did not apply.

In addition to and in enlargement upon that said memorial of April 23, 1909, we, your memorialists, respectfully represent:

First. That H. R. 11798, commonly known as the Weeks bill, now pending before the Senate, while transparently masquerading as a measure pertaining to the navigation of navigable streams, as an excuse for violating the Constitution, is in reality an undertaking to extend the system of Federal feudalism, under the guise of forest reserves, throughout the United States.

Second. That the provisions of the said bill, if put into effect, would deprive the people of this State of the ownership and control of the waters of our streams from the head of navigation to their extreme source; would place the lands of the forest reserves practically outside the jurisdiction of the State; and would terminate and annul all unperfected lands and mining claims on such lands.

Third. That the waters and the right to their use belong to the people of the State under the terms of our constitution—a compact accepted and approved by the Federal Government when Colorado came into the Union.

The enjoyment of that ownership and right by the people of the State the officials of the Federal Government now undertake to deprive them of, because, incidentally, some of the public lands are in proximity thereto, and the application of the right of eminent domain by the paramount ownership denied.

The plan of these officials, as pertains to water powers, as enunciated in the last report of the Forester, is a provision for a tax of $1 per horsepower per year, by virtue of the arbitrary demand for Federal consent to the enjoyment of the people's ownership and right in those waters. Any provision whatsoever—as a possible benefit to the people in return therefor—in the nature of "conservation," a guarding against monopolies, or the protection of the consumer against exorbitant prices, is ignored and omitted. It is wholly and entirely a measure to impose a Federal tax upon our pepole in the enjoyment of their natural resources.

The United States Geological Survey estimates the possibilities of the water-power development of Colorado at from 1,000,000 to 2,117,000 horsepower. Accordingly, an annual tax of $1,000,000 to $2,117,000 on the consumers of our State to the Federal Treasury is of no mean proportions.

Fourth. That the principles involved in the above example, respecting water powers, are no more unjust to the people of our State than those forming the basis of the contemplated measures for imposing a like Federal tax upon our other natural resources, viz, coal, oil, natural gas, phosphates, and other minerals.

Had these principles been applied from the first, in the administration of the public lands of Colorado, and with such royalty as is proposed for Alaska, viz, $0.05 per ton, our people the past year would have paid into the Federal Treasury $600,000 for the privilege of digging their own coal. And, eventually—based upon the United States Geological Survey estimate of Colorado tonnage, viz, 371,000,000,000 tons—we would pay as such tax $18,500,000,000. This would effect a perpetual tax, and no less unjust than to tax the product of our wheat fields.

We would further respectfully request you to reflect that ours is not exclusively an agricultural State. And, in lieu of our territory being a vast and rich farming country, to afford us perpetual revenue, with which to maintain State governmental institutions, we, as a State, are entitled to whatever governmental revenue there may be arising from our natural resources.

Fifth. That the vast territory of public domain assumedly ordained to be administered in perpetuity; the great diversity of governmental undertakings incident thereto; the enormous business interests of our people involved; and the large number of people affected thereby demand that the government of the public domain be through definite laws and with readily available judicial hearings.

As an instance in illustration of this we point to the recent ruling of the Secretary of the Interior, reversing the ruling of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, permitting settlement upon the former lands of the Ute Indians, in the western portion of our State. This, like hundreds of others, was purely a legal question and should have gone to the courts in the first instance.

When it is contemplated that our mines, water power, oil, gas, phosphates, and other industries are to be subject to the supervision and domination of subordinate Federal officials, provision for the application of definite laws and relief through readily available judicial hearings should likewise be contemplated.

Sixth. That, in the ultimate, we adhere to the principle—and we believe it sustained by the Constitution—of Government ownership of the public lands as a trust, for their disposal; State authority in the regulation of the use of, and State benefit to all governmental profit or revenue arising from, the natural resources within the State, except profit to the Government to an extent in keeping with the long-established custom and practice of the Government in the sale of lands and timber; and except, also, its retention and administration of actual timber lands for forestry purposes.

Affirming, however, that this State will willingly and effectively preserve and develop to their greatest efficiency the forests within its borders whenever afforded a proprietary right thereto.

To these features of vital importance to our social, industrial, and political existence we point you, and respectfully pray for relief and protection.

STEPHEN R. FITZGARRALD,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE MCLACHLAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 22.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Legislature of the State of Colorado (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas the Yellowstone National Park is nature's great wonderland, of very great interest to the whole people, and therefore has become the summer Mecca of many hundreds of persons of varied financial condition; and

Whereas it has come to our knowledge that certain concessions have been granted therein which are practically monopolistic of the hotel and transportation business, and that said hotels make it a rule not to furnish accommodations to such people as see fit to travel in their own conveyance or who attempt in any way to enjoy the privileges of the park without patronizing the transportation lines; and

Whereas travel by automobile has become quite universal and as safe as by horse and carriage, and the roads of the park are suitable to both means of conveyance; and

Whereas the good-roads movement is resulting in the building of roads through the States surrounding the park, aided and fostered largely by reason of the demand therefor by automobile owners touring the scenic routes through those States to the park: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the honorable Secretary of the Interior Department be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to require said hotels to be conducted in the interest and for the accommodation of the traveling public regardless of their means of conveyance in, about, or through said park, and that said transportation lines be conducted in the interest and for the accommodation of the traveling public regardless of whether or not such travelers patronize said hotels; and be it further

Resolved, That said Secretary be, and he is hereby, requested to change the rules of the Interior Department regarding the present limitation upon means of conveyance which may be used in the park, so that automobiles may hereafter be used by the owners thereof or others in the park.

The secretary of state is hereby directed to send a certified copy of these resolutions to the Secretary of the Interior Department and to each Member of the congressional delegation in Congress from this State.

President of the Senate.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Brockton, Mass., remonstrating against placing boots and shoes on the free list. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROCKTON, MASS., April 17, 1911.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Pursuant to a vote of the Brockton Board of Trade, the following resolutions are respectfully submitted for your earnest consideration:

"Whereas advices from Washington are to the effect that the farmers' free-list bill, so called, includes a provision to place boots and shoes on the free list, thereby enabling manufacturers in Canada and other foreign countries to bring their product into the United States free of duty; and

"Whereas the passage of the bill with this provision would operate greatly to the detriment of one of New England's most important industries, namely, the manufacture of boots and shoes:

"Resolved, That the Brockton Board of Trade registers its emphatic protest against this proposed legislation, on the ground that it would most seriously cripple this important industry without furnishing adequate compensating good to this or any other part of this country.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to Senators HENRY CABOT LODGE and WINTHROP MURRAY CRANE and Representative ROBERT O. HARRIS, and that a copy be sent to the secretary of the New England Federation of Business Organizations, with a request that the matter be put before that body and its affiliated organizations and similar action requested at once."

Very respectfully,

A. H. ANDREWS, President.
ELROY S. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the New England Shoe Wholesalers' Association, remonstrating against placing leather, boots, and shoes on the free list. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 14, 1911.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE.

DEAR SIR: I beg to notify you that the following resolution in opposition to the proposal to place leather and boots and shoes on the free list was unanimously adopted by the New England Shoe Wholesalers' Association at a meeting held in this city yesterday:

"Whereas it appears from the published reports from Washington that the Democratic majority in the National House of Representatives contemplates making an effort to place leather and boots and shoes on the free list: Be it

"Resolved, That the secretary of this association is hereby instructed to communicate with our New England Senators and Representatives in Congress, urging them to strongly oppose such a proposal as being a menace to the prosperity of our American leather and shoe manufacturing industry and to the welfare of the thousands of wage earners employed in it."

Trusting you will do everything in your power to avert this threatened blow to our American shoe and leather industry, I am,

Yours, very truly,

THOS F. ANDERSON, Secretary.

A bill (S. 1364) granting a pension to Mary A. Dodds; and

A bill (S. 1365) granting an increase of pension to Gottlieb Ruge, alias George Ruge; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CURTIS. At the request of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] I introduce a bill amending section 1608 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to amend chapter 55 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia,'" approved February 23, 1905.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, if there be no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that it was to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those bills have always gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Minnesota indicated on the bill that he would like to have it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the reference will be to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I will have to object. It has been the uniform custom to send those bills to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I suggest that the bill be withdrawn until the Senator from Minnesota comes in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be withdrawn for the present.

By Mr. CLAPP, subsequently:

A bill (S. 1366) amending section 1608 f of the act of Congress entitled "An act to amend chapter 55 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia,'" approved February 23, 1905.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota what the bill particularly relates to. The title does not develop it.

Mr. CLAPP. It relates to changing the code with reference to serving notice in condemnation proceedings. My clerk had it noted to be referred to the Senator's committee. Relating to the code, I thought it naturally should go to the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Kansas having advised me of the desire of the Senator from New Hampshire, I have changed it. The matter of its reference is wholly immaterial to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have in the District of Columbia Committee a subcommittee on the judiciary, and I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BROWN:

A bill (S. 1367) granting an increase of pension to William J. Perkins; and

A bill (S. 1368) granting an increase of pension to J. W. Barnes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 1369) to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations, to be used in researches in home economics, and regulating the expenditure thereof; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 1370) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Moylan C. Fox, executor and trustee of the estate of Joab Lawrence, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1371) granting an increase of pension to Francis Weaver (with accompanying papers); and

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 21), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, It is the sense of the Senate: (1) That intervention by the United States in the existing revolution in Mexico would be without justification and contrary to the settled principles of this Government of noninterference in the domestic concerns of other countries; (2) that the extent to which the United States should go in the present emergency in Mexico is to enforce their neutrality laws with vigor and fully protect life and property within their limits along the Mexican boundary line. The rights of citizens of the United States residing in Mexico are those of neutrals in belligerent territory.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 22), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-second Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

CHUGACH NATIONAL FOREST LANDS, ALASKA.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 23), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate a list of all claims, locations, filings, or entries made under lands withdrawn from the Chugach National Forest in Alaska and "restored to the public domain" by the Executive order of October 28, 1910 (No. 1260), giving the date of each claim, location, filing, or entry, and the name of the person or persons who made the same and any and all action taken thereon, and if soldier's additional homestead scrip was used in acquiring any right therein to give the name of the soldier to whom each scrip certificate so used was issued, the amount of land taken under such certificate, and the name of each claimant or entryman who used the scrip certificate. Also what, if any, assignments of any of such claims, locations, filings, or entries have been made, and to whom.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call up the motion entered on Monday last to refer the joint resolution respecting the election of Senators by the people to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution referred to, which will be read the second time by its title.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States was read the second time by its title.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the motion; but I do think that a statement should be made so that there may be no confusion in the future regarding the reference of resolutions of this character. I think that an examination of the record will show that for 40 years every resolution of this character had been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections until the last session of Congress, when, at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, a similar resolution was referred to that committee. No debate was had at that time, and no objection was made.

If it is to be the policy of the Senate in the future to refer resolutions providing for amendments to the Constitution on questions relating to elections to the Committee on the Judiciary rather than to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I think it ought to be fully understood, so that there may be no confusion whatever.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections during these 40 years has been presided over by men like Senator Morton of Indiana, from the year 1872 to 1877, followed by Mr. Wadleigh until 1880; by Mr. Saulsbury, from 1880 to 1881; by Mr. Hoar, from 1882 to 1893, a period of 11 years; by Mr. Vance, from 1893 to 1894; by Mr. Gray, from 1894 to 1895; by Mr. Mitchell of Oregon, from 1896 to 1897; by Senator Chandler of New Hampshire, from 1897 to 1901; and from 1901 to 1911 by the former Senator from Michigan, Mr. Burrows.

During that period a number of different resolutions of this character have been referred to that committee. Elaborate reports have been made upon them, some favorable and some adverse. Were it not for the fact that, through an inadvertence, during the last session a similar resolution went to the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not think any question as to the reference of this joint resolution would have been raised. But that resolution went to the Committee on the Judiciary, received the consideration of that committee, was reported and debated, and now at this session several resolutions introduced into this body have also been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, while the House joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in order that the facts from the record may go in with the statement of the Senator from Vermont, I will ask his leave to say that I have a memorandum, furnished by the Assistant Librarian of the Senate, which shows that since 1871 out of 22 resolutions on this subject which have been presented and referred, 3 of them have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the first in 1886, the next in 1898, and then the one to which the Senator from Vermont has just now alluded. I simply make that as a statement from the record of the Senate itself.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What became of the other 19 resolutions?

Mr. CULBERSON. They were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes. Mr. President, as I stated in the beginning, so far as I am concerned personally it makes very little difference to which committee the joint resolution shall be referred, as I am a member of both of these committees, but I did think it better that before this motion should be adopted the Senate should be fully informed of the action of the Senate during the 40 years I have mentioned.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in my judgment every proposed amendment to the Constitution ought to be considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the fact that such resolutions as this have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections does not affect my judgment in that respect. It happens now to be true that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is composed of lawyers, and that is always apt to be the case; but if a resolution of this character must go to that committee, then an amendment of some other character would be referred to the committee supposed to have jurisdiction over that subject. The other committees may or may not be composed of lawyers, and yet I hardly think that any Senator will gravely doubt the advisability, not to say the wisdom, of having matters so vital as proposed amendments to the Constitution considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. That committee always has been and is now composed of excellent lawyers, and it is to be hoped that it will always include in its membership the ablest lawyers of this body.

Without intending to invite any debate on another question, I am moved to say that if the amendment to the Constitution proposing an income tax had been subjected to the scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary it would not have since its submission been subjected to some of the arguments which have been urged against it. That circumstance, concurring with what I believe to be general propriety, moves me to believe that the motion of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] ought to be adopted; and I say that the more readily because, unlike the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I am not a member of both committees. I am a member of the committee to which the joint resolution has been referred, and I am not a member of the committee to which, in my judgment, it ought to be referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONS OF NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is my intention to address the Senate to-day on the resolution I offered Monday last respecting the relations of this country with Mexico. But the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has given notice of his intention and desire to address the Senate at this time on another subject, and as a matter of courtesy to him I will yield the floor until he has concluded.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to express my appreciation of the kindness and courtesy of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in giving way to me on this occasion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territory of New Mexico and the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am a new Member of this body. There is a belief abroad on the outside that it is an unwritten law that a new Member should remain silent in his seat until he becomes better informed as to the affairs of government and be guided by the wisdom and better understanding of those who have been longer in the public service. It would be most pleasing to me to sit at the feet of the distinguished Members of this body who have served their country here for so many years and who are so much better informed as to the history and needs of the Nation than I can possibly be; but, Mr. President, as I understand my duties and responsibilities as a United States Senator, they commence when I assume the duties of office and continue until I give way to my successor, and during all of that time the people of my State and of the whole country are entitled to the best service I am able to render as their servant.

It so happens that at the very beginning of that service this body is confronted with a great problem in which I personally and the people of my State, yea, the people of every State in the Union, are profoundly and vitally interested. A Territory, constituting a part of the great domain now under the dominion of this Nation, is asking to be admitted as one of the States of the Union, and to be allowed to take on the powers and responsibilities of a free and sovereign State. Her plea for admission is met not with the claim that she does not possess the necessary territory or population, or is otherwise not within the constitutional provision authorizing the admission of States into the Union—that has been determined by the enabling act providing for her admission—but solely because her constitution provides for direct legislation.

THE CONSTITUTION.

The National Constitution provides, Article IV, section 3—

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

This provision of the Constitution, with the exception of the limitations therein stated, which have no application here, leaves the question of the admission of a new State wholly to the judgment and discretion of Congress. Acting upon the authority thus given it, Congress passed an act providing for the admission of the Territory of Arizona into the Union of States. That act, amongst other things, provides for a constitutional convention to form a constitution for the State and the submission of such constitution to the people of the Territory for their approval; and, further—

> After organization they (the delegates to the convention) shall declare, on behalf of the people of said proposed State, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, whereupon the said convention shall be and is hereby authorized to form a constitution and provide for a State government for said proposed State, all in the manner and under the conditions contained in this act. The constitution shall be republican in form and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

This enabling act requires that the convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the said State, amongst other things:

> First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages, or polygamous cohabitation, and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians, and the introduction of liquors into Indian country are forever prohibited.
> Fourth. That provisions shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control; and that said schools shall always be conducted in English.
> Fifth. That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the State legislature.

It is further provided:

> SEC. 22. That when said constitution and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted shall have been duly ratified by the people of Arizona, as aforesaid, a certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon and upon any provisions thereof which were separately submitted to and voted upon by the people. And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof, if any, or if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of said notification from the President of the United States, issue his proclamation for the election of the State and county officers, the members of the State legislature, and Representative in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution, all as hereinafter provided; said election to take place not earlier than 60 days nor later than 90 days after said proclamation by the governor of Arizona ordering the same.

The right of Arizona to be admitted as a State, subject only to a compliance with this act, was established by the act itself. Therefore the only question here is whether the Territory has complied with the conditions imposed or not. The one and only objection urged against its admission is that it has not formed a constitution "republican in form." If it has not done this, it must be admitted that this is a valid reason for refusing to allow the Territory to come into the Union as a State.

WHAT IS REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT?

The Constitution provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." It contains no definition of a republic or of a republican form of government. This can only be determined, so far as the Constitution is concerned, from its whole scope and tenor. But the assailants of this proposed constitution go further, and maintain that the republican form of government must be a representative form also, and as we shall see a little further along the only objection to the constitution presented here is that it is destructive of or inimical to the representative form of government that they claim is included in the term "republican." As the Constitution throws no direct light upon the question, we must look elsewhere to ascertain, if we can, what is meant by and included in the term "republican form of government" within the meaning of the Constitution. As the Constitution does not attempt to define it, we must assume that it was used in the generally accepted sense, if there be any.

Much learning and labor have been expended in the effort to determine what is a republic. In the general division of the forms of government into monarchies, aristocracies, and democracies a republic is classed with the latter, and is sometimes defined as a representative democracy to distinguish it from what is termed a pure democracy, where the people act directly and as a whole. It would be impracticable and profitless to enter here into any extended discussion of the varied and different views of the many writers on this subject.

I have chosen, for my present purpose, to take the late work, Introduction to Political Science, by Prof. Garner, as containing all that is needed to develop what I desire to call to the attention of the Senate. I call attention to some of its definitions.

First is the general divisions of states, as follows:

On the basis of the number of persons in whom the sovereign power is vested, states may be classified as monarchies, aristocracies, and democracies. A monarchy is a state directed by a single supreme will; an aristocracy is one in which the exercise of sovereignty resides in a comparatively small number of persons; while a democracy is one in which the exercise of sovereignty rests with the mass of the population.

Coming nearer to the matter we have in hand, the author says:

Democracies are of two kinds—pure or direct and representative or indirect. A pure democracy is one in which the will of the state is formulated and expressed directly and immediately through the people acting in their primary capacity. A representative democracy is one in which the state will is ascertained and expressed through the agency of a small and select number who act as the representatives of the people. A pure democracy is practicable only in small states where the voting population may be assembled for purposes of legislation and where the collective needs of the people are few and simple. In large and complex societies, where the legislative wants of the people are numerous, the very necessities of the situation make government by the whole body of citizens a physical impossibility.

Coming down to our own country, he has this further to say:

The Constitution of the United States imposes upon the National Government the duty of guaranteeing to the component States a republican form of government, but it does not attempt to define the essential characteristics of such a government, simply assuming that they are too well understood to admit of a difference of opinion. Madison, in The Federalist, said it was a government in which there was "a scheme of representation." It was, he said, "a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior." The two "great points of difference," said Madison, "between a republic and a democracy are: First, the governing power in a republic is delegated to a small number of citizens elected by the rest; and, second, a republic is capable of embracing a larger population and of extending over a wider area of territory than is a democracy. In a democracy the people meet and exercise the government in person; in a republic they assemble and administer it by their representative agents."

As to the effect of such a government upon the people and the state the comments of the author are interesting and instructive, particularly in view of the almost universal demand of the people for a fuller share in the conduct of public affairs and the widespread dissatisfaction with and disapproval of the manner of selecting representatives and the almost universal distrust of the representatives so selected. He says:

By no one has the strength of democratic government in its representative form been so ably set forth as by John Stuart Mill, who defined it as that form in which "the whole people, or some numerous portion of them, exercise the governing power through deputies periodically elected by themselves." There is no difficulty in showing, he asserts, that the ideally best form of government is that in which the supreme controlling power in the last resort is vested in the entire aggregate of the community, every citizen not only having a voice in the exercise of that ultimate sovereignty, but being at least occasionally called on to take an actual part in the government, by the personal discharge of some public function, local or general. The only government, he continues, which can fully satisfy the exigencies of the social state is one in which the whole people participate, and the degree of participation should everywhere be as great as the general degree of improvement of the community will allow, and ultimately all should be admitted to a share in the sovereign power of the state. So far as the welfare of the community is concerned, the superiority of popular government, Mill goes on to say, rests upon two principles of as universal truth and applicability as any general proposition which can be laid down respecting human affairs. The first is that the rights and interests of the individual can only be safeguarded when he is able to "stand up" for them himself; the second is that the general prosperity attains a higher degree and is more widely diffused in proportion to the amount and variety of the personal energies enlisted in promoting it.

But the greatest glory of democratic government, in the opinion of its votaries, does not flow so much from its own inherent excellence as a political contrivance as from its influence in elevating the masses of the people, developing their faculties, stimulating interest among them in public affairs, and strengthening their patriotism by allowing them a share in its administration. Democracy refuses to concede that some are born to rule and others to obey, and that some should be citizens and others subjects. It recognizes no privileged classes, but puts all on a footing of political equality.

De Tocqueville has justly remarked that almost all revolutions which have changed the face of the world have had for their purpose the destruction of inequality.

The same author, in his study of democracy in America, dwelt repeatedly upon the interest which the American people take in public affairs, their high state of intelligence in regard to political matters, and their natural patriotism. He pointed out that one of the great advantages of a democracy is that it serves as a sort of training school for citizenship. Mill likewise laid great stress upon the influence of democracy in elevating the character and intelligence of the masses. The "most important point of excellence," he said, "which any form of government can possess is to promote the virtue and intelligence of the people themselves, and the first consideration in judging of the merits of a particular form of government is how far they tend to foster intellectual and moral qualities in the citizens." The government which does the best, he continues, is likely to be the best in all other respects. Government is thus an agency of education as well as an organization for managing the collective affairs of the community.

No careful observer of the times and the conditions that have led us up to this controversy can fail to see the dangers that confront the Nation and the several States if the Federal authorities shall refuse to admit a Territory into the Union of States for no better reason than that the people must be confined to a strictly representative form of government; and any attempt to extend the power of the people to the enactment of laws, under reasonable limitations and regulations, in order to protect them and the State from the corrupt election of representatives, and against the failure of such representatives to perform their duties as such, is an offense against our principles of representative government that must exclude them from entering into statehood. And yet that is precisely what is proposed by the opponents of this effort to bring the Territory of Arizona into the Union.

WHAT IS THE ISSUE?

Mr. President, this controversy presents an issue of transcendent importance to the people of this country. The eyes of the Nation are upon us. If the Congress shall refuse to approve the proposed constitution of Arizona on any such grounds as this, it is assuming a grave responsibility. The consequences may be far-reaching and disastrous. The people are aroused and most earnest in their demand for just such legislation as is contained in this proposed constitution. The conditions are such as to call for the most careful and conscientious consideration of the important questions involved.

My sense of the importance of the issue is my excuse for going more particularly into the real issues involved and what I believe may be the consequences of a refusal to approve this proposed constitution.

What is the real objection to the constitution? No one need be in doubt on that subject. It is one phase of the struggle that has been going on in this country between the common people and the privileged self-seeking interests, affecting the right to govern the Nation, the States, and the municipalities. The people are insisting that they shall be permitted to govern their own country and that it shall not be corrupted and governed by the power of money in the hands of men who care nothing for the Government except as a means of increasing their vast wealth. They insist that this country shall be a government of the people and not a plutocracy of wealth.

THE LORIMER CASE.

Mr. President, this widespread uprising against the corruption that, if persisted in, must eventually overthrow our representative form of government, is founded upon the most convincing evidence that corruption is eating at the very vitals of the Republic and threatening the perpetuity of our free institutions. We need not go outside of this Chamber to find evidence of this fact. The pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the past few months will disclose a condition that has brought the whole Nation to shame. It was charged that the election of a Member of this body had been procured by corrupt practices and the bribery of votes in the legislature. An investigation was made by a committee of the Senate, and it was found by a majority of that committee that the Member was entitled to his seat. A minority of the committee reached a different conclusion and submitted a resolution declaring that the Senator was not entitled to a seat in this body.

Mr. President, I need not enter upon a discussion of the evidence in that case. It is enough to say that it was clearly and sufficiently shown that corrupt practices had been resorted to in the election and that some votes had been purchased. By a small majority the Senate decided that the incumbent was entitled to his seat, and that was all that was decided. It was perfectly evident, however, that the case turned upon the question, not whether there had been corruption, not whether bribery had been committed, but whether or not enough votes had been bought to change the result. The rule of law, and of precedent in this body, that the title of a Member to his seat could not be forfeited by corruption or bribery unless it be shown that the corruption was such as to have resulted in an election, was invoked, and the most ingenious means of counting the vote and considering its effect were urged by distinguished Senators on this floor to save the Member's seat.

Mr. President, in an investigation of this kind, not being a contest between claimants for the office, this Senate was not bound by strict rules of law. In the consideration of such a resolution it is not sitting as a court to try an issue of law or fact. The proceedings of the Senate show conclusively that Senators so considered it. Evidence was received, without question, that would not have been allowed in a court of justice. There is no appeal from a decision of this body. If there were, and the proceedings were submitted to the review of a court, controlled by rules of law, error enough would have been found to reverse the case a dozen times over. But, Mr. President, when the final test came, when a decision was to be rendered, and that upon evidence much of which had been received in violation of well-settled rules of law, and then for the first time, the strict rule of law that enough votes to change the result must have been purchased to unseat the Member whose title to the office was in question was insisted upon and prevailed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. It is not in order for a Senator in discussing any question upon the floor to impugn the honor or integrity of either a Member of the Senate or any committee of the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. Neither have I done so, nor intended to do so, Mr. President, as I shall show further on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call attention to the rule:

RULE XIX.

* * * * * * *

2. No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

To charge that Senators comprising a committee of this body have disregarded evidence, or that they have refused to receive evidence that should be received, is within that rule.

Mr. WORKS. I will remind the Senator from Idaho that I have made no such statement at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not pursue it further than to say that when the Senator reads his remarks in the RECORD tomorrow he may probably have his memory refreshed.

Mr. WORKS. My memory is clear on the subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am amazed, Mr. President, that a question should be raised as to any violation of the rule on the language which the Senator from California has used in reference to the case which was under contest in the last session. No word or line in the paragraph which has just been submitted by the Senator as a part of his argument here is a reflection upon any Member of the Senate or upon any committee of the Senate, and no strained construction of what he said could possibly put the Senator in that embarrassing position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the Senator from California understands the rule of the Senate, and he will proceed in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, as to the manner of procedure, I did not ask for any action. I merely called the attention of the Senator, as is proper, to the rule more in the nature of a suggestion of warning.

Mr. WORKS. I am greatly obliged to the Senator for his suggestion and warning, but I desire to say, Mr. President, that I have in no way violated the rule that has been read by the Senator, nor have I had any intention to do anything of that sort.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from California will permit me, I would ask the Senator from Idaho if he contends that the rule which he has just quoted is applicable to a case involving the validity of the seat of a Member of the Senate, which necessarily involves a discussion of the manner of his election? If corruption is charged in the action of the legislature of the State from which he is credited, necessarily the very nature of the question involves a discussion of the integrity of the legislature of that State. Does the Senator from Idaho contend that such a rule would apply to that case?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that question was not within the controversy. I referred to the remarks of the Senator from California as applied to members of a committee of the Senate, not as applied to the person who might be under consideration.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to remind the Senator from Idaho that I have not in any way referred to a committee of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair ruled upon the point of order raised by the Senator from Idaho?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Iowa that the Chair was not asked to rule upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho presented a point of order. It is either well taken or it is not well taken, and unless he withdraws it, I ask for a ruling of the Chair upon it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I read a standing rule of the Senate in support of the proposition that it is not in order to speak disrespectfully of a Member of the Senate in discussion. The words, I presume, are taken down, or the Senator may have them in manuscript.

The Chair, in order to rule upon that point of order, would of course have to pay attention to the expressions used, so as to determine whether or not they were in violation of the rule. It was no personal sensitiveness on my part; it was merely in the interest of orderly procedure. It is not customary, and it very seldom occurs in this body, that a Senator speaks with disrespect of another Senator.

Mr. WORKS. It has not occurred in this instance.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho rose for a purpose. He stated his purpose to be to state a point of order. His point of order was that the Senator from California had violated the rule, which he proceeded to read. The Senator from California has either violated the rule in what he has said or he has not, and he is entitled and the Senate is entitled to a ruling of the Chair upon the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Iowa that he understood the Senator from Idaho when he rose to a point of order, as he stated, simply to state a rule of the Senate, and he did not insist that the Senator from California had violated that rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. I called attention to the rule.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that there is anything in this Chamber such as admonition and warning on the part of one Senator toward another. I very clearly understood the Senator from Idaho to rise to a point of order and to state it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, the ruling which the Senator from Iowa calls for could only be made in case the Senator from Idaho called the Senator from California to order, which he did not do. He rose to a point of order for the purpose indicated by him, to make a statement, and there is nothing to be decided unless the Senator from Idaho calls the Senator from California to order. If he does that, then, under the rule, it is the duty of the Senator from California to take his seat, and for the Senate, and not the Chair, to rule before he proceeds. But he has not been called to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will proceed.

Mr. WORKS. It is not my purpose to reargue that case or to reopen it in any way. It is not for me to question the correctness of those proceedings or the conclusion reached. I am citing the case to show why the people of this country may justly claim a larger share in the selection of their officers and the control of legislation. It is one out of hundreds of cases where corrupt and illegal influences have been brought to bear to control elections and the enactment of legislation detrimental to the public at large. If such influences are allowed to control an election to the high office of United States Senator, if powerful influences are at work to control legislation by representatives chosen by such means, and otherwise amenable to such influences, what is the remedy? Are the people of this country helpless to protect themselves from such results under our representative form of government? Is there no way by which such evil influences may be met and overcome? Some Senators here seem to think not. When the people attempt to limit the power of their representatives and assume some of that power themselves by ignoring the unfaithful representative and acting directly at the polls, or by recalling him and substituting an honest and capable representative in his place, the cry is raised that this effort to control their own representatives and their own government is a violation of the Constitution of the United States and an encroachment upon the principles of our representative form of government.

Mr. President, this is the issue that confronts us to-day. The proposed constitution of Arizona provides for the initiative, referendum, and recall. Objection is made to the admission of this Territory as a State on this ground and this alone. I assume that no Senator on this floor will maintain that the ultimate power, the sovereignty of this Nation, does not rest in the people. Therefore it is not a question of power in the people, but as to how that power may be exercised. We have a written Constitution. It came from the people. The simple question is: Have they by their own act in forming the Constitution deprived themselves of the right of self-government through direct legislation? Are they compelled to submit wholly to the acts of representatives selected, not by them but by the powerful interests that are menacing the life of the Nation and forced upon them in many instances by fraud, corruption, and bribery?

POWER OF THE PEOPLE.

This is a grave question that reaches the foundation of the Government and threatens the integrity of our free institutions. It is not only the people of Arizona that are demanding the right to govern their State. Many other States already in the Union have enacted just such laws as are authorized in the proposed constitution of Arizona, and many other States are demanding and will soon enact such or similar laws. In my own State an amendment to the constitution authorizing the initiative, referendum, and recall has been, by the legislature, submitted to the people, and it will be adopted by an overwhelming majority. Congress need not delude itself with the belief that this demand for direct legislation comes from fanatics and radical reformers only. The demand is universal and is supported by the best citizens in the country without regard to party. It is the result of the widespread and well-founded belief that the affairs of state and of the Nation are, to too great an extent, governed by interests adverse to the best interests of the whole country and controlled by fraud and corruption. The absolute necessity for some legislation that will put the people in possession and control of their government and drive the interests and the political bosses out of politics and the official life of the Nation is too evident to admit of question.

The power to govern exists in the people. The necessity for a more direct exercise of that power is manifest. Therefore the sole question is: Have the people the right to enact and enforce the laws proposed to effect their objects, or are they precluded from so doing by the Federal Constitution?

In commenting on the clause of the Constitution providing that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government," the Supreme Court, in Minor v. Happersett (21 Wall., 162, 175), said:

> It is true that the United States guarantees to every State a republican form of government. It is also true that no State can pass a bill of attainder, and that no person can be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. All these several provisions of the Constitution must be construed in connection with the other parts of the instrument and in the light of the surrounding circumstances.
> The guaranty is of a republican form of government. No particular government is designated as republican; neither is the exact form to be guaranteed in any manner especially designated. Here, as in other parts of the instrument, we are compelled to resort elsewhere to ascertain what was intended.
> The guaranty necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such a government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. In all the people participated to some extent through their representatives elected in the manner specially provided. These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form, within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.

In In re Pfahler (150 Cal., 71) the Supreme Court of California had under consideration the constitutionality of a provision of the charter of the city of Los Angeles providing for the initiative in the passage of an ordinance. It was held that the charter was not repugnant to either the Constitution of the United States or of the State of California. In passing upon that question and in commenting on the decision in Minor v. Happersett, just mentioned, the court used this language:

> It is unnecessary to here do more than to refer to the widely known and well-recognized form of local government that prevailed in several of the States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, known as the New England town government, under which all the inhabitants in town meeting directly exercised such legislative power as was essential to the conduct of local affairs. No difference material to the objection under discussion is to be found in the fact that they did this in public meeting rather than by secret ballot at the polls, as under the provision before us. The objection here made is that, under the republican form of government guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, such power can not be directly exercised by the people, and, so far as that objection is concerned, if the people may legislate directly in town meeting, they may do so by their votes at the polls. The constitutional provision was framed and adopted with full knowledge of this system of local government that then obtained in four of the States, and that system was continued under the Constitution without any question as to its validity.

Mr. President, the town meetings in the several States where they prevail constitute the most direct and democratic action by the people that could be possible. This manner of conducting elections and transacting public business was recognized by the Constitution as a valid and constitutional exercise of the power vested in the people. Its validity never has been questioned and probably never will be. But when a Territory presents a constitution for its government as a State expressly providing for this same direct exercise of power by the people it is denounced as not republican or representative in form. I submit, Mr. President, that this objection is wholly without force or reason, and should not influence the vote of a single Senator against the admission of the Territory as a State.

The referendum has been in force for certain purposes in almost, if not quite, every State in the Union from the beginning, and that in the most important of all questions—the adoption and amendment of constitutions—besides many other things.

Mr. Bryce, in his admirable work on the American Commonwealth, has this to say on that subject:

> So far back as 1843 we find Wisconsin referring it to the voters to decide whether or no banks shall be chartered. Minnesota declares that a certain class of railway laws shall not take effect unless submitted to and ratified by a majority of the electors. And she provides, by a later amendment to her constitution, that "the moneys belonging to the internal improvement land fund shall never be appropriated for any purpose till the enactment for that purpose shall have been approved by a majority of the electors of the State voting at the annual general election following the passage of the act." In this last instance the referendum goes the length of constituting the voters the ultimate financial authority for the State, withdrawing from the legislature what might seem the oldest and most essential of its functions. So in not a few States no debts beyond a certain specified amount may be contracted, except in pursuance of a vote of the people; and in others the rate of taxation is limited to a certain ratio to the total valuation of the State, subject to a power to increase the same by popular vote. And in California no law changing the seat of the State government is valid unless approved by the people.

Direct legislation has been in force in Switzerland for nearly 50 years, and has been adopted in many of the States and made a part of the law of a large number of the cities of the country.

The initiative and referendum has been in force in Oregon for some time, and the question of the constitutionality of such legislation has been before the supreme court of that State more than once, and the question as to what constitutes a republican form of government has, in some of the decisions of that court, received careful consideration. Of these decided cases I refer particularly to Kadderly v. Portland (44 Oreg., 118), in which, after a full statement of the scope and effect of the laws of that State on the subject, the court uses this language:

> Nor do we think the amendment void because in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, Article IV, paragraph 4, guaranteeing to every State a republican form of government. The purpose of this provision of the Constitution is to protect the people of the several States against aristocratic and monarchical invasions, and against insurrections and domestic violence, and to prevent them from abolishing a republican form of government. (Cooley Const. Lim. (7 ed.) 45; 2 Story, Const. (5 ed.), par. 1815.) But it does not forbid them from amending or changing their constitution in any way they may see fit, so long as none of these results is accomplished. No particular style of government is designated in the Constitution as republican, nor is its exact form in any way prescribed. A republican form of government is a government administered by representatives chosen or appointed by the people, or by their authority. Mr. Madison says it is "a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior." (The Federalist, 302.) And in discussing the section of the Constitution of the United States now under consideration, he says: "But the authority extends no further than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican form, they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for antirepublican constitutions." (The Federalist, 342.) Now, the initiative and referendum amendment does not abolish or destroy the republican form of government, or substitute another in its place. The representative character of the government still remains. The people have simply reserved to themselves a larger share of legislative power, but they have not overthrown the republican form of the government or substituted another in its place. The government is still divided into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the duties of which are discharged by representatives selected by the people.

Under this amendment, it is true, the people may exercise a legislative power and may, in effect, veto or defeat bills passed and approved by the legislature and the governor; but the legislative and executive departments are not destroyed, nor are their powers or authority materially curtailed. Laws proposed and enacted by the people under the initiative clause of the amendment are subject to the same constitutional limitations as other statutes, and may be amended or repealed by the legislature at will.

OREGON SUPREME COURT CITED.

The same question came again before the Supreme Court of Oregon in the case of Kiernan v. The City of Portland (112 Pac. Rep., 402). In that case the court said:

To ascertain whether taking from the legislature and delegating to the municipalities, or to the localities affected, local self-government, or a right to enact, maintain, and alter their charters as the legislature formerly did, and whether the taking from the legislature the right to make special laws upon the subject violates this provision of the National Constitution, makes it important that we first ascertain what is meant by a republican form of government. It is an expression which all assume to understand, yet, judging from the many unsuccessful attempts of eminent statesmen and writers to give it a clear meaning, it would seem the phrase is not susceptible to being given a precise definition. Especially is this true when sought to be applied to the constitution of different States, concerning which Mr. James Madison, a member of the Constitutional Convention, said: "* * * If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or may at least bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure for a limited period or during good behavior. It is essential to such government that it be derived from the great body of society and not from any inconsiderable portion or a favored class of it * * *." (The Federalist (Hamilton ed.), paper 39, p. 301). Another and more pointed definition appears in Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall., 419, 457; 1 L. ed., 440), by Mr. Justice Wilson, a member of the Constitutional Convention, who but a short time after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in adverting to what is meant by a republican form of government, remarked: "As a citizen, I know the government of that State (Georgia) to be republican, and my short definition of such a government—one constructed on this principle, that the supreme power resides in the body of the people." From which it follows that the converse must be true; that is to say, any government in which the supreme power resides with the people is republican in form. (See also Mr. Justice Wilson's remarks to the same effect, reported in 5 Elliott's Debates, 100.)

Measured in the light of the above, it is difficult to conceive of any system of lawmaking coming nearer to the great body of the people of the entire State, or by those comprising the various municipalities, than that now in use here, and, being so, we are at a loss to understand how the adoption and use of this system can be held a departure from a republican form of government. It was to escape the oppression resulting from governments controlled by the select few, so often ruling under the assumption that "might makes right," that gave birth to republics. Monarchical rulers refuse to recognize their accountability to the people governed by them. In a republic the converse is the rule. The tenure of office may be for a short or a long period, or even for life, yet those in office are at all times answerable, either directly or indirectly, to the people and in proportion to their responsibility to those for whom they may be the public agents, and the nearer the power to enact laws and control public servants lies with the great body of the people the more nearly does a government take unto itself the form of a republic—not in name alone, but in fact.

When the question was before the Legislature of New Jersey, the question of the constitutionality of such legislation was referred to the attorney general of the State for his opinion. He declined to give an opinion of his own on the ground that the question presented was a purely political one. But he did present in his opinion an interesting account of the views expressed by other distinguished gentlemen that are worthy of our consideration. He says, in part:

The amendment proposed is, of course, inconsistent with our present State constitution and the existing form of government, but there is nothing to prevent the people from changing that constitution by the means provided in it, except such restriction as may be found in the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution, in section 4 of Article IV, provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence."

Whether the constitution of a State is republican in form is a political question which has been much discussed, and the opinions of statesmen have varied with the exigencies of the occasion. The antirepublican restrictions upon the right of suffrage in Rhode Island in 1841–42 were supposed by some to warrant the interference of the Government of the United States, but this view was not accepted by any department of the Government.

It was insisted in the arguments on reconstruction that a constitution which excluded a large portion of the people from suffrage on account of color was not republican in form. Others have insisted that the only object of the clause was to exclude the possibility of a monarchical government. The form of the governments of the several States composing the Union, as they stood at the time of their admission, it has also been insisted, was the proper standard by which to determine whether any afterchange in any of them makes its form of government other than republican. It is said that in the admission of a new State no judicial question is raised on which the courts could act, because the power is vested exclusively in Congress, and that no change in its government after its admission can make a State constitution other than republican which does not essentially alter its form or make it different in some essential particular from those of the other States at the time of their adoption.

Mr. Madison, in No. 43 of the Federalist, commenting on the clause, says: "But the authority extends no further than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so and to claim the Federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not change republican for antirepublican constitutions, a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance."

Mr. Story, in section 1815, adopts the view of the Federalist on this subject. He says: "The Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety upon this subject that it supersedes all further reasoning. 'In a confederacy,' says that work, 'founded on republican principles, and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other, and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained.'"

On December 14, 1867, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, one of the ablest debaters and best constitutional lawyers of his time, in the Senate of the United States expressed his views on this subject. He said, among other things:

"By some leading men in Congress it was then contended that a government ought not to be regarded as republican in form which permitted slavery or which excluded a portion of its citizens from participation in the government because of the color of the skin. The exigencies of the times made this doctrine acceptable. The reorganizing States were required to present constitutions forbidding slavery and establishing impartial suffrage. In the course of reconstruction, however, the question was warmly discussed whether, if the political departments of the Government should erroneously, arbitrarily, and, for partisan ends, determine and declare that a particular State government was not republican in form and therefore should not be recognised, such State or its citizens could have any appeal to the judicial tribunals. It was not doubted that if the case was one of a newly organized State applying for admission to the Union the decision of Congress upon its admission, however erroneous, unjust, or arbitrary, would be one the conclusiveness of which would not be open to discussion. Congress having full power to admit or reject new States, the insufficiency of the reasons which may have governed its action can not possibly affect its validity. But in other cases also it must be conceded that a State aggrieved by an unjust decision is equally without legal remedy. The courts can not aid it, for upon political questions they must accept and follow the conclusions of the political department. (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 42; Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700; White v. Hart, 13 Wall., 649.) In such a case the only redress possible is through an appeal to the people. Such is the conclusion of the cases above cited."

Our Government is a representative government. It has been called a representative democracy. Representation is one of the essentials of a republican form of government, and the United States can not fulfill that obligation without guaranteeing representation in the House. (Flanders and Hahn's case, 3d Feb., 1863, Dawes's Rep., 3 Contested Elections, 446.)

Mr. Cooley says: "The power of the people to amend or revise their Constitution is limited by the Constitution of the United States in the following particulars:

"(1) It must not abolish the republican form of government, since such act would be revolutionary in its character, and would call for and demand direct intervention on the part of the Government of the United States.

"(2) It must not provide for titles of nobility, or assume to violate the obligation of any contract, or attaint persons of crime, or provide ex post facto for the punishment of acts by the courts which were innocent when committed, or contain any other provision which would, in effect, amount to the exercise of any power expressly or impliedly prohibited to the States by the Constitution of the Union; for while such provisions would not call for the direct and forcible intervention of the Government of the Union, it would be the duty of the courts, both State and national, to refuse to enforce them and to declare them altogether void, as much when enacted by the people in their primary capacity as makers of the fundamental law as when enacted in the form of statutes through the delegated power of their legislatures." (See Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 44.)

Prof. Parsons, in his chapter entitled "Twenty reasons for the referendum," gives the following synopsis of benefits likely to flow from legislation of this kind:

It will perfect the representative system by eliminating serious misrepresentation.

Better men will be attracted to political life.

It will simplify elections, separating the judgment of men from the judgment on issues, and disentangle issues so that each may be judged on its own individual merits.

It will lessen the power of partisanship.

It will elevate the press, voting will turn more on reason, and mud will be less in demand in the political market.

It will educate the people, intellectually and morally.

It will stop class legislation and give labor its rights. * * * Farmers and artisans are not fairly represented in legislative bodies, but at the polls they will have their due preponderance and can pass such laws as they please.

Direct legislation (i. e., the initiative) tends to stability * * * acting as a safety valve for discontent.

It favors wealth diffusion by depriving the wealthy of their enormous overweight in government and giving preponderance of legislative power to the common people whose interests are opposed to the vast aggregation of private capital.

Experience here and in Switzerland has proven the measureless value of direct legislation and the utter futility of all objections raised against it.

STABILITY OF GOVERNMENT DEPENDS ON INTEGRITY OF PEOPLE.

Mr. President, for myself I am not expecting the millennium to come in politics if direct legislation shall be universally adopted in this country. After all and in the final analysis the stability of our institutions must and does depend upon the honesty and patriotism of our people. No form of government will save the country from ultimate downfall if the people in whom the power to govern is vested are venal and corrupt. Late developments in some of the States indicate widespread corruption and buying of votes in some localities. If this kind of corruption has become general throughout the country, then indeed is this Republic in deadly peril of ultimate dissolution. The interests and the men who have cultivated this tendency to bribery and corruption are traitors to their country and should be hunted down and surely and severely punished in every community where votes are bought and sold. No change in the form of government, no increased power in the hands of the people to the exclusion of their representatives will remedy this deadly evil. The beneficial effects of direct legislation must, at last, depend upon the integrity of the people themselves. If the increased responsibility placed upon the individual voter shall make him a better, more loyal, and more trustworthy citizen, as I believe it will in most cases, then this reform legislation will have accomplished much for the country.

HOW FAR REFORM LEGISLATION SHOULD GO.

Mr. President, as to the extent to which such legislation should go, I am particularly anxious not to be misunderstood. I do not believe in a pure democracy. It is a form of government too weak and unstable to meet the demands of a Nation like our own, with the many great and conflicting interests that are struggling for supremacy, the important problems that must be met with judgment and firmness, and with our relations, as a great world power, with the other nations of the world. If our Government should degenerate into a pure democracy it will surely, inevitably, go to pieces. If I believed that the direct legislation reforms I am advocating would bring us eventually to that kind of government, I could not give them my support. But surely there is a happy medium, a middle ground between the unwarranted and corrupt power now exercised by our representatives, under our present system, which has created such nation-wide distrust on the part of the people, and a system which destroys our representative form of government and establishes a pure democracy in its place.

It is that middle ground that will preserve the rights of the people and so control the conduct of representatives as to render them amenable to the source of their authority that I am seeking. There must be some system of checks and balances whereby the people may act in a proper case where the representative wrongfully or corruptly refuses to act, may defeat action wrongfully taken by him in defiance of the interests of the public, and remove him from office and power where he has been unfaithful or corrupt. This much the people have a just right to demand. They are asking no more than this in demanding the initiative, referendum, and recall.

Mr. President, does any Senator on this floor entertain any doubt as to the necessity for these reforms in legislation? Is there a lingering doubt in the mind of any observing citizen of this great Republic that the power of the special interests and corrupt political bosses must be met and overthrown in some way to preserve the political freedom and independence of the people? Can any Senator suggest a better way than that of giving greater power to the people through the direct primary and the initiative, referendum, and recall?

BOSS RULE IN CALIFORNIA.

I speak from knowledge when I say that the corporate interests and political bosses of my own State have been utterly routed, our politics purified, the standard of citizenship elevated, and the confidence of the people in better conditions vastly increased, through these reforms alone. They have banished the political caucus and convention, the convenient tool of corruptionists, and made every voter independent to do his own will at the polls. It has enabled them to nominate their own candidates to offices where before the voter had no choice but to vote for candidates nominated by the machine or not vote at all. The result has been all that any good citizen could desire. Whereas, before, one great corporation, with its allied forces of evil, nominated and elected our officers, and the officers elected were its servants and not the servants of the people, at the first election after a primary election law went into force we elected an honest, courageous, and independent governor, a man who takes orders from no corporation machine or boss, a lieutenant governor of the same caliber, and the best legislature the State has ever had in its entire history. It was a complete transformation from corrupt, machine politics, dominated by special interests, and ruled by political bosses of their choosing, to honest, independent politics ruled by the people themselves. The Republican Party is again governed and controlled by Republicans and not by a railroad company and its hired political bosses. Does anybody suppose that this work of redemption, this work that has made the Republican Party and the people of our State free and independent, could have been accomplished without the aid of this reformative legislation that substituted the secret ballot at the polls for the caucus and convention that enabled political bosses and designing politicians to manipulate nominations and control elections as they pleased?

PROUD OF THE PEOPLE OF ARIZONA.

Mr. President, I am proud of the people of Arizona who have come here with this constitution, so framed as to protect them and their new State from fraud, corruption, and bribery in elections and in public office. I am glad they had the courage and the manhood to stand by their convictions and refuse to temporize and submit a constitution satisfactory to the interests and machine politicians in order to become a State. Arizona had better remain a Territory for all time than to stultify her citizenship and American manhood by surrendering her convictions and bowing down to the powers that be in the politics of the day. I hope, if the Federal authorities shall refuse them admission under such a constitution as this, they will stand on their manhood, as good and true American citizens, and stay outside until the politics of this country is purified, regenerated, and elevated so that their progressive and enlightened constitution will be their sure passport to statehood. They can afford to wait. The time will not be long. The issue presented here will be fought and won by the people very soon. The American people are alive to the situation. They see the evil that has dominated them and that threatens the very life of their country, and they know the remedy and have learned by the experience of a few of the more advanced States that they have the power to apply the remedy, and they will apply and enforce it.

THE RECALL.

But, Mr. President, the recall is singled out as the one indefensible provision in the proposed constitution and the right given to recall judicial officers is denounced as particularly obnoxious. I am in entire sympathy with the objection to the recall of judges. I objected to it in my own State in a letter written by me on the subject, in this language:

> I am glad you had the courage and good judgment to oppose the application of the recall to judges. The future of this country is greatly dependent upon a fearless and independent judiciary. Any conscientious man, who has served as judge, will tell you that he has been compelled by his oath and his sense of duty to render decisions that were unpopular with him, and if left free to exercise his own desires no such decisions would have been rendered. Indeed, the most difficult thing a judge has to do is to control his own feelings and decide cases according to law and not according to his own feelings of sympathy or the reverse.
> Such a judge will, of necessity, render decisions that are unpopular with the public as well as himself in the performance of his imperative duty. It will be just such unpopular decisions that will arouse public resentment and induce the recall of the judge who has the honesty and the courage to do his duty, often against his own feelings. The judge who will bow to his own feelings or to public clamor, often ill founded, will never be recalled, while the judge who does his duty will fall a victim to the public indignation based on wholly false ideas of the duty of a judge. We will still have judges that will do their duty fearlessly in spite of the big stick in the form of the recall. I hope we have courageous men enough in the legislature to resist the public clamor that is pressing for this legislation that will make the weak judge weaker and encourage the dishonest judge to decide cases in such way as to secure public favor instead of deciding the law without fear, favor, or affection. It will be a sorry day to this State when a law is passed that must, in the nature of things, degrade the judiciary and make it less honest, less fearless, less independent. No possible good can come of such legislation, while much harm may, and almost certainly will, result if any such law is enacted and attempted to be enforced.

I still maintain the views then expressed. But neither the governor of my State, whose absolute sincerity and honesty of conviction on the subject no one who knows him will question, nor the legislature, agreed with me. Much to my astonishment some of the judges of the State did not agree with me either, but seemed to want to have the legal right to be recalled. The Legislature of California passed the resolution submitting a constitutional amendment providing for the recall of all officers, including judges, almost unanimously; the governor approved it, and the people of California will adopt it at the polls by an overwhelming majority, in my opinion. They believe in it whether I do or not, and they have a right to it if they want it and believe it to be right, however much some of us may regret it.

But, Mr. President, what has the question whether I or any other Senator does or does not believe in the recall of judges to do with the right of Arizona to be admitted as a State? The provision for the recall of judges and other officers is not in violation of the Constitution or any law of the United States. It is not in violation of any provision, requirement, or limitation of the enabling act. It is a question that affects Arizona alone and one that her people have a right to settle for themselves. I have no right to set up my judgment against theirs. It is not a matter that gives me any right to object to her admission as a State, and I shall not allow my own convictions as to the wisdom of such legislation to warp my judgment in so important a matter.

RECALL IN LOS ANGELES.

In my own city the recall of other officers has been in force for 10 years. I have seen the urgent necessity for it there and have seen it tested. In the beginning I was opposed to it. Experience has convinced me that it is one of the best agencies for the purification of politics and the elevation of the standard of official duty, obligation, and integrity that has yet been devised.

May I, Mr. President, give two instances in proof of what I say? A gentleman of good standing as a business man was elected mayor of the city. The city was largely Republican. He was a Democrat. He was elected by the political boss, the employee of the railroad company, at the last moment turning the machine Republican vote over to the Democratic candidate. Everybody who knew anything about politics in Los Angeles at that time—happily they have improved since—knew that this meant that the patronage of the office had been turned over to the political boss, and that the railroad company and its allies might plunder the city at their will. As a natural and inevitable consequence the city administration soon became so profligate and corrupt as to create a public scandal. The recall was invoked. The necessary petition was quickly obtained and an election called. But the mayor, who had so betrayed his trust, was not willing to submit his case to a vote of the people. He resigned the office and refused to be a candidate at the election, as he might have been under the charter. To make it still worse he confessed, in a public statement, that he took that course on the advice of the political boss who had elected him and ruined his good name. The other case was that of a member of the city council who corruptly voted to give the public printing to the newspaper making the highest instead of the lowest bid therefor. He clung to the office and was ousted from it by the vote of the people at the recall election. These are the only cases of the exercise of the power of recall in our city. They both were aggravated cases, and the right of recall was imperatively needed and righteously used.

The recall is not a matter of speculation or experiment with us. We have tried it and know its value and efficiency in dealing with corrupt public officials.

Mr. President, it should be admitted and carefully borne in mind that these are all extraordinary remedies, and should be resorted to only in extreme cases, and then with deliberation and caution. The one great danger to these great reform measures lies in the too frequent and unnecessary resort to their use. So far with us this has not been done, and I hope will not be in the future. Our people know their value, and nothing would induce them to surrender the right of their own free will.

There is one other phase of this question of the admission of Arizona that I wish to consider very briefly. It is maintained in some quarters that because the enabling act provides that Congress and the President may "approve" the proposed constitution, either would be justified in refusing to admit the Territory if there is any part of it that does not meet with their approval; for example, if the President shall not approve the recall of judges, it is claimed that he can not consistently approve the constitution or consent to the coming in of the Territory thereunder. In my judgment this is an unwarrantable construction to place upon the enabling act, and the refusal to approve the constitution on any such ground would be entirely unjust and illegal. The enabling act provides specifically what shall be done by the people of the Territory to entitle it to be admitted as a State. That statute is the full measure of its absolute right to admission. No official or representative of the National Government has any right to impose any other, further, or different condition or limitation of the right. It is too late now to impose new conditions. If the people of the Territory have complied with the terms upon which they were allowed to form a constitution, the Territory is entitled, as a matter of law and justice, to have the constitution approved, and no representative of the Government has any right to refuse to "approve" it. He has no right to impose any other test.

Now, Mr. President, may I in conclusion——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator from California concludes his remarks, will he permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was absent from the Chamber during a portion of the remarks which the Senator from California has made. Do I understand it to be the position of the Senator from California that the only duty which the President or Congress has to perform in this matter is to determine whether or not the constitution adopted by the people of Arizona provides for a government republican in form?

Mr. WORKS. And conforms to the enabling act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And conforms to the specific provisions of the enabling act?

Mr. WORKS. That is it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I recall the provisions of the enabling act, it authorizes the submission to the people of separate provisions—that is, any provision which the constitutional convention may desire to have submitted to the people separately from the main constitution may be so submitted. The language of the enabling act, in section 22, is:

SEC. 22. That when said constitution and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted shall have been duly ratified by the people of Arizona, as aforesaid, a certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon—

And so on.

And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof, if any, or if the President approves the same—

And so on, then the State shall be admitted.

I ask the Senator from California whether that does not contemplate that Congress shall have an active duty to perform with reference to the separate provisions which are submitted?

Mr. WORKS. As I understand, the separate provisions are not a part of the constitution. They are in form of ordinances or an ordinance that accompanies the constitution. I may be wrong in that construction, but that is my understanding of it. It might be possible that Congress or the President might refuse to approve some of those separate propositions which are submitted by way of ordinance. But, as I understand, that is not a part of the constitution and would not prevent the coming in of the Territory in case it should be disapproved.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I perhaps did not read——

Mr. WORKS. I included the whole of that in my remarks, but it was not read, because I did not care to take up the time of the Senate and because I thought Senators were perfectly familiar with them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the language is, if I may still further interrupt the Senator——

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language is:

And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof—

That is, if Congress and the President approve not only the constitution, but in addition to that approve the separate provisions thereof, then the proclamation shall issue and the State be admitted. But is not the converse of that true, that if Congress does not approve either the constitution or the separate provisions, then the proclamation shall not issue and the State shall not be admitted?

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Utah take the position that if Congress or the President should disapprove one of the separate articles contained in the ordinance, it would defeat the whole constitution?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am asking the Senator from California. That seems to be the language.

Mr. WORKS. I am asking the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say that seems to be the language.

Mr. WORKS. That is not the construction I place upon it, if you ask me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not definitely made up my own mind upon it. I am only calling the attention of the Senator from California to it. But the language seems to be susceptible of that construction.

Mr. WORKS. I am much obliged to the Senator from Utah for calling my attention to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to ask the Senator from California whether he has considered the question of the power of Congress to admit the State of Arizona or any other State whether the enabling act has been complied with or not? It seems to me to be entirely competent for this Congress now to admit this State whether any provisions of the enabling act have been complied with or not. It is a violation of no provision of the Constitution and of no law of the United States. It is for Congress now to say whether or not this Territory is entitled to admission, and I am of opinion that Congress is not limited or restricted, so as to be unable to admit a State if it chooses to admit it now whether it has complied with the provisions of the enabling act or not.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator from Virginia that it is not necessary that any enabling act should be passed at all. I think Congress has the absolute power to admit the State without any such preliminary enactment of a statute, but in this case we are proceeding under the enabling act. Possibly the Congress might disregard that act at the present time, but I have taken it for granted that this matter would be presented upon the act that has already been passed by Congress. However, upon the question of law submitted by the Senator, I agree with him entirely.

WORD OF CAUTION AND WARNING.

And now, Mr. President, may I, in conclusion, indulge in a word of caution and warning? As I have said, I am a new Member here. I am sent by one of the great Western States that is growing rapidly in population and importance. I have communed with the people in every part of the State and know their sentiments on these important questions of political reform. The initiative, referendum, and recall are loudly and earnestly demanded by an overwhelming majority of our people of all political parties. I want to say to Senators on this side of the Chamber, representing the great Republican Party, that unless the party heeds this demand and responds to it by enacting and enforcing these reform measures, it will go down to defeat and final destruction and oblivion. I come from one of the great progressive cities in this great State of California. That city and the whole State had for years, until the last election, been in bondage, politically, to one powerful corporation and its corrupt political allies and bosses. It held not only our city but the whole State in its grip and dictated the policies of both the Republican and Democratic Parties, and controlled the election and appointment of officers—municipal, State, and Federal. At the last city election the good people of our city, both Republicans and Democrats, after enacting a nonpartisan election law, joined together and wrested the government of the city from corporate control and elected one of the best city governments of any city in the country. Our people were not content with this victory.

The State was yet to be redeemed from this same condition of bondage to the interests. Republicans who stood for independence and purity in politics formed an organization within the party, known as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. The league made its fight for the regeneration of the Republican Party and for the deliverance of the party and the State from corporate and boss rule. The movement was entirely successful. The league nominated its candidates at the primary election with few exceptions, and elected them at the final election by large majorities. The Republicans were not alone in this great work of redemption. They were aided by thousands of good, patriotic Democrats, who joined their forces because they believed in the principles of reform that the league stood for and were unable to bring them about in their own party that was not in power.

Mr. President, I had my share in this work of purifying the politics of my party, my city, and my State. But for the aid given this movement by me, however feeble my efforts may have been, as compared with other patriotic and devoted citizens, I would not be here to-day. I believe in these reforms. I know what they have done for my city and State. They may do the same for the whole Nation. If I did not, in my capacity as a United States Senator, defend them with all my mind and with all my heart and with all my strength, I should feel myself recreant to those great principles, to the people who sent me here, to the Republican Party, and to my country.

Mr. President, what I have said in the way of warning to this side of the Chamber may be said with equal force and pertinency to Senators on the other side. The Democratic Party needs to be redeemed as well as the Republican Party. If either of these great parties see the light, and in good faith takes up these reforms, it will sweep the country if the other party fails to respond to the popular demand. If neither of them shall conform to public sentiment on these great questions, both will be consumed by the fire of public condemnation and a new party will be built upon their ashes, a party that will represent the people and not the interests. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 19) I submitted Monday last respecting the relations between the United States and Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution indicated by the Senator from Missouri, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. STONE on the 17th instant, as follows:

Whereas a condition of turbulence and disorder prevails throughout the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas as a result of such turbulence and disorder, it is reported that the lives of a large number of American citizens resident in Mexico are imperiled, and that their property is in danger of lawless appropriation by bands of irresponsible men; and

Whereas in conflicts between the military forces of the Mexican Government and revolutionists near the border line between the United States and Mexico several American citizens on the American side of the boundary line have been slain as the result of Mexicans firing across the line, and other American citizens while peaceably pursuing their avocations or while in their homes have been wounded; and

Whereas a great and important public work on the Colorado River in Lower California is being constructed by Americans, and for which work Congress has made a large appropriation, and which work is being constructed on the Mexican side by American engineers and contractors under an agreement made with the Mexican Government, is being obstructed and endangered by repeated interferences of lawless bands of Mexican revolutionists who have at different times appropriated property of the contractors engaged in the work and have so seriously delayed the work as to greatly endanger it by threatening the lives of workmen and thus disorganizing the working force; and

Whereas numerous leading newspapers in Europe, especially in London, report that certain European Governments, many of whose subjects and citizens reside in Mexico and have large property interests there, are contemplating some intervention by force in the affairs of the Mexican Republic, ostensibly for the protection of the lives and interests of their people; and

Whereas one European power has already landed on Mexican territory an armed force of marines from one of its warships under the pretense of preventing an attack upon a Mexican town by revolutionary forces; and

Whereas this unfortunate condition in the governmental and political affairs of Mexico appears to grow worse and more acute from day to day: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and hereby is, directed to make speedy inquiry into the facts recited in the preamble hereto and into such other facts as said committee may deem necessary to a complete explanation and exposition of the actual conditions prevailing in Mexico, and said committee is directed to make report of its findings, with such recommendations as the committee may deem advisable, respecting the duty of the United States in the premises, and which report may be made to the Senate in open or executive session, as the said committee may deem most expedient in the public interest.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it will require only a short time for me to say what I have in mind to say at this time, but because of the international importance of the subject in hand it behooves me, as it does all others, to speak with the utmost deliberation and caution. This is an hour when every responsible official of this Government should speak and act with deliberation, and not impulsively. The condition of public affairs prevalent in Mexico must, of necessity, be a source of profound regret to those connected with the Government of the United States, as well as to the people of this country as a whole. Mexico is our nearest neighbor on the south, being separated from us for a part of the way by a river and for a part of the way by what may be called an imaginary line, as it certainly is an imperceptible line. The Government of Mexico is republican in form, in large measure fashioned after the Government of the United States. The relations between the two countries, commercial and otherwise, are close. They are connected by international railways, which traverse the domain of each in continuous and unbroken lines. A large number of American citizens, estimated at more than 60,000, are residing in Mexico, scattered over and doing business in various States constituting the Mexican federation. These people, under our treaties with Mexico and the comity of nations, are lawfully there, and as long as they are peaceable and orderly are entitled to protection by the Mexican Government. Americans have enormous property interests in that Republic. It is said on apparently reliable authority that these property possessions aggregate approximately $1,000,000,000, and it is estimated that American holdings in Mexico are substantially double those of all other foreign peoples combined. In these circumstances it is but natural that this Government and the American people should have a profound concern in whatever affects the happiness, prosperity, progress, and well-being of Mexico. It not only accords with our national sentiment, but also with our national interests, to maintain relations of amity and good will with the people of Mexico, and to contribute whatever we can to the development and welfare of that Republic. Our interest in this neighboring state, sentimental and material, is vastly greater, and, I believe, is founded on higher considerations than that of any nation over the seas. We do not want war in Mexico, but peace; we do not want disorder, but order. We want peace and order to prevail there because of our interest in the material growth and spread of the country; but above that also because of our deep anxiety to see all experiments in republican government on this hemisphere successful, and because we view with alarm all conditions, however arising, which seem to threaten the stability of such experiments and which tend to bring them into disrepute.

Mr. President, in what I have said I am confident I voice the feeling and judgment of the American Government and the American people. Nevertheless, we can not close our eyes to the unfortunate conditions now existing in Mexico; and, moreover, we not only can not close our eyes, but we can not remain passive and inactive and permit disorder to run riot to the peril of the lives, liberty, and property of American citizens lawfully resident in that Republic. There is unquestionably a solemn duty resting upon us in this regard which we can not ignore, however delicate it may be or however great the responsibility it may impose. But here I will take occasion to say that in the discharge of our duty and responsibility in this behalf we should move, and we will move, in our own time and according to our own way. We are both willing and able to fully perform the duty resting upon us, and in due time and on proper occasion we will perform it in all its bearings, both as it relates to Mexico and to other countries; but we will do it in our own way and will not be precipitately driven into any different course by any kind of outside pressure. I hear talk, mostly newspaper talk, that certain European powers are contemplating an interference in the affairs of Mexico. As to that, perhaps, at this time it is sufficient to say that in my opinion the American Government and people would view any effort, certainly any effort on an extensive scale in that direction, as an act of unfriendliness to the United States. The Government of the United States has not and will not shirk the full and proper performance of its duty, and whatever European powers might feel inclined to undertake in the direction indicated should only be undertaken in conjunction with and under the lead of the United States. Mexico is an American country with a republican form of government, and the world knows how sensitive the people of this country are on the subject of armed intervention by European or Asiatic powers in the affairs of American nations. In the main I concur in what the senior Senator from Maryland said in his interesting address before the Senate last week, in which he declared that the Monroe doctrine was not involved in the existing Mexican situation. But should European powers contend that if the United States insist upon carrying the Monroe doctrine to the point of regarding with pronounced disfavor any armed interference whatsoever in the affairs of American Governments, and especially of any armed occupation of the territory of any such Government, that we are thereby obligated to see to it that peace and order are maintained in the Central and South American Republics and in Mexico, we may still well answer that we must ourselves be the first judge as to when we should interfere and how we should proceed. We have not yet assumed the office of a policeman patrolling these American Republics, and even if other countries insist upon thrusting that station with its responsibilities upon us, we will at least object to those countries exercising a supervising jurisdiction over us and directing us when and how to proceed. Whenever grave questions arise, such as confront us now, I think that other foreign powers with whom we happily sustain relations of amity and friendship should recognize the fact that we understand and appreciate our duty, and that in the end we will so discharge it as to command universal approval. I indulge the belief that the reports of a contemplated interference by any European power in the affairs of Mexico are unfounded. The landing a few days ago of an armed force of marines from the British warship Shearwater at San Quentin, Mexico, is the only incident so far occurring that would give color of truth to these reports. The papers report that the landing of this force was for the purpose of preventing or resisting an attack by revolutionists on the town of San Quentin, and also that the battleship stopped at San Quentin for the purpose of taking aboard an English subject and two American citizens who desired to get away from the zone of danger. If this report be true, I have this to say about that incident: That the landing of that force was not necessary to enable the three men in question to board the vessel, and hence if the marines were landed merely to prevent a Mexican force attached to the revolutionary movement in Mexico taking possession of this Mexican town, the act was arbitrary, and being a hostile demonstration on Mexican territory was in effect an act of war if authorized or approved by the British Government. It was, perhaps, in itself an act of too little consequence to invite serious attention or to warrant particular criticism, nevertheless I express the opinion that it will be generally regarded with disapproval by the American people. Outside of this single incident I am in possession of no facts that would support the press reports of a purpose on the part of European powers to thrust themselves speedily into Mexican affairs. For the present I am disposed to regard these stories as fictitious and sensational. And here, Mr. President, I will digress long enough to confirm what the senior Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], a distinguished member of that committee, took occasion to say last week respecting widely circulated and oft-repeated stories connecting Japan with Mexico. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I was invited by the President, as were other members of that committee, and also members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, to examine the diplomatic correspondence had between the State Department and American officials in Mexico, and between the State Department and the official authorities of Mexico, and all other papers and documents relating to the present disturbance in that country. I scrutinized these documents with the utmost care, and in addition to that I talked with the President at considerable length respecting the Mexican situation, and I wish to state in the most positive terms that there was not a word in this voluminous correspondence which indicated even remotely that Japan had aught to do with the troubles of Mexico, or that Japan was seeking any concession from or alliance with Mexico. Moreover, I violate no confidence in saying that the President assured me in the most positive terms that he had no information whatever connecting Japan with Mexican affairs, and that he regarded the newspaper stories to the contrary as the purest of fabrications. Mr. President, I have been greatly puzzled to know who it is or what interest it is that is so wantonly persistent in the dastardly and criminal enterprise of fomenting discord and hostility between the United States and Japan. I can not escape the belief that there is some powerful interest behind this activity, bent upon promoting ends most monstrous and criminal. This Government maintains a small army of detectives and inspectors of many kinds, and I venture to suggest that some of these high-salaried officials, many of whom have little to do, and much of that little mischievous, might be better employed than they now are if they should be detailed to discover and unmask this conspiracy against the peace of nations.

Mr. President, while I believe it to be true that these reports of a contemplated interference by European powers or by Japan are unfounded, that alone does not relieve us from, nor in any degree lessen, the obligations incident to our own duty and responsibility. I have said that widespread disorder prevails in Mexico. In the circumstances of the situation, as we see it and know it to be, what is the duty of the United States in the premises? This is a question we can not lightly put aside. We must answer it, and upon that answer we must act. What is the situation with which we are confronted? Let me summarize the facts, or the main facts, of the case. For a period covering the life of a generation Gen. Porfirio Diaz has occupied the Presidency of Mexico. For reasons that should be manifest, I think it best, in the circumstances of the hour, to withhold the expression of any opinion as to the wisdom of the same individual occupying and exercising the powers incident to the chief executive office of a great Republic for so long a period; but I can with propriety say that the progress of Mexico in all the arts of peace during the long incumbency of President Diaz has challenged universal admiration. But in spite of the fact that during the last three decades Mexico has in many important respects advanced with marvelous strides, it is not surprising that the long continuance in power of the same man, surrounded by his personal and political adherents, should result in such governmental conditions, and possibly such abuses, as would arouse intense opposition and excite resistance thereto even to the point of turbulence. However, it is not within the scope of my purpose to discuss the points of controversy between the opposing factions in Mexico, or to express an opinion upon the merits or demerits of their respective contentions. The issues between these factions do not enter into the questions I am discussing. I think we can well afford to pass all that as being of less immediate concern to us. I am talking about American interests and the rights of American citizens, not about quarrels between warring factions in Mexico. It is sufficient at this time for us to deal with the situation which has grown up out of this controversy as it affects the people of this country. This controversy has resulted in a widespread insurrection or revolutionary uprising against the established Government of Mexico. This revolutionary movement is headed by Francisco Madero, jr., who is in general command of a large force, more or less organized and equipped, and operating in numerous Mexican States. There is no need to dwell upon this feature of the subject, as the entire reading public is well informed as to the extent, character, and progress of this insurrectionary assault upon the Diaz régime. The disorder incident to it is so great that in several States there is no responsible government in fact capable of maintaining the peace and protecting the lives and property of people who are taking no part in the sanguinary disturbances sweeping over the country. In some sections the conditions border upon absolute anarchy, and lives and property are at the mercy of roving bands of lawless men. In many of the cities and States of Mexico there is a strong anti-American feeling, and frequent expressions of grave apprehension on the part of Americans have come to our State Department that the Mexican Government would be unable to protect American citizens against hostile and vicious elements in case of an uprising against them. Demonstrations of hostility against Americans have been made on several occasions and at different points. These demonstrations have occurred at such large centers of population as Guadalajara, and even in the City of Mexico itself. A few weeks ago the governor of the State of Jalisco made a most inflammatory public speech at Guadalajara, accusing Americans of inciting and participating in the revolution, thus accentuating the strong anti-American feeling already existing there, and tending to foment riotous outbreaks. As a consequence, Americans in Guadalajara were in a state of fear amounting almost to panic, and naturally they sought the protection of their own Government. There are thousands of Americans scattered over the Mexican Republic, engaged in numerous employments and without means of self-defense. Numerous instances have been reported of the forcible confiscation and appropriation of the property of Americans by revolutionists or by bands of men supposed to be of the revolutionary party. In Lower California a state of practical anarchy exists now, and has existed for some time past. The great work being done for the reclamation and preservation of the Imperial Valley, for the construction of which Congress appropriated $1,000,000, has been greatly interfered with and endangered. That part of the work which is on the Mexican side of the boundary line is being done by American contractors, under the direction of American engineers, by virtue of an agreement with the Mexican Government. On several occasions bands of armed men have taken possession of construction camps and forcibly appropriated arms, commissaries, live stock, wagons, and so forth, belonging to the contractors, and have taken forcible possession of and used the cars and railroad tracks employed by contractors in the necessary prosecution of their work. They have threatened the lives of Americans and of Mexicans employed as workmen, and by these means have greatly disorganized the working force and seriously delayed the work of construction. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have already been expended upon this work, and by reason of these interferences and consequent delays the entire work already done is greatly endangered by the floods that always sweep down the Colorado River during the spring months. The work is at a critical point in its progress, and the contractors and engineers complain that these repeated interferences make it almost impossible for them to prosecute it with that diligence necessary to avoid probable disaster. Contractors have telegraphed that if not protected it would be next to impossible to go on with the work, and that in all probability these enforced delays would result in enormous losses, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars. In addition to all these complaints from American sources, the Mexican Government has preferred complaints on its own account. That Government has repeatedly protested that the Government of the United States was not sufficiently active in enforcing its neutrality laws, or sufficiently observant of its obligations as a neutral power under international law. Among other things it has been charged by the Mexican Government that revolutionary forces were organized on American territory and were permitted to cross the line to wage war against the Mexican Government.

This summary, Mr. President, is sufficient to afford a reasonably clear insight into conditions in Mexico, and discloses the situation which confronted the President during the month of March. Such facts as I have detailed, and others of like import, were brought home daily to the attention of the President and his advisers. In view of this situation the President ordered a section of the Army, comprising about 20,000 men, to the Mexican border. These troops are distributed along the border in Texas, Arizona, and California, engaged chiefly on patrol duty. It was given out at the time by the President that these troops were sent down upon the border for the purpose chiefly of military training and maneuvering. I accept the President's statement that this was one of the objects he had in view in directing this Army movement; but, speaking for myself, I declare that in my opinion the President would have been fully justified in ordering these troops into positions near the boundary line for the purpose of better enforcing our neutrality obligations and to be in readiness for the better protection of American interests—by which I mean the protection of American citizens against assault and the protection of American property against wanton and lawless destruction—in case the emergency for quick and aggressive action should arise. I believe the country would, as it should, have supported the President if he had stated without qualification that that was the prime object he had in view. He is not only the Commander in Chief of the Army, but he is also the President of the United States. In view of the turbulent conditions prevalent in Mexico, and the ever-increasing menace to American lives and property, I believe the President would have been derelict and fallen short of his duty if he had not put the forces at his command in position and readiness for quick and effective action if unhappily the necessity for using force should arise. In emergencies of this kind, involving grave international complications, partisanship has no business in our counsels. There are times, and this is one of them, when we must rise above the plane of partisanship and view the questions before us solely from the standpoint of Americans. As a Democrat, esteemed by some friends on both sides of this Chamber as being sometimes somewhat too partisan, I wish unqualifiedly to indorse this action of President Taft in ordering troops to the Mexican border. In this connection, however, I must not neglect to say in ordering troops to rendezvous on our southern border it was not the intention of the President to initiate any offensive demonstration against either the federal or revolutionary forces in Mexico. The President, of course, is not clothed with power to declare war—that power being vested by the Constitution in Congress—and I will venture to say that the President questions, if he does not disclaim, his constitutional right to take any step which in itself would amount to an act of war without the express authority of Congress. I do not think I will violate any confidence if I say that when the President ordered these troops to the Mexican boundary he had no intention of intervening in Mexican affairs, or of using the troops to invade Mexican territory, except possibly in the event of the Diaz government falling during the recess of Congress without being succeeded by any responsible government able to maintain order, and then only to an extent absolutely necessary for the protection of American citizens. The President has in nowise authorized me to make this statement, but I assume the responsibility of making it on my own account as expressing my understanding of the President's attitude. As I understand his attitude, he does not believe that he is authorized under the Constitution to employ force against a foreign state unless authorized thereto by Congress, except to resist attack or to meet a situation the exigencies of which will not admit of delay. Believing this to be the attitude of the President, I give to it my hearty approval. I feel that the President has acted with wise discretion and has exercised a degree of good judgment that should command universal commendation.

Mr. President, since these troops were massed in Texas and along the border, and within the last few days, circumstances of a very serious nature, to which I have not yet adverted, have arisen. Both the Mexican Federal forces and revolutionists have been and are being concentrated in large numbers close upon the boundary line between that country and this. Some two weeks ago, in skirmishes along the Rio Grande below El Paso, Tex., bullets fired by one side or the other fell among American troops standing guard on the American side of the river, but fortunately without casualty. At Juarez, across the river opposite the city of El Paso, a Mexican Federal force in large numbers is encamped. A revolutionary force, reported to be numerically greater than the force in Juarez, is advancing upon that city, and a battle upon the outskirts of that city is daily threatened. A conflict at that point, of the magnitude this one would probably assume, would imperil the lives of thousands of Americans in the beautiful city of El Paso. Douglas, Ariz., and Agua Prieta are opposite to each other and practically adjacent on the very edge of the boundary line. The revolutionists, a thousand strong or more, were in possession of Agua Prieta and fortified the town. Last week a Federal force of equal or greater strength attacked the revolutionists at Agua Prieta, and in the battle bullets fired by the contending forces were showered upon the American side, resulting in the death of several American citizens and the more or less serious wounding of others. The President, through the State Department, notified the Mexican Government at the City of Mexico of this tragedy, and the revolutionists were also notified, and both were warned against any repetition of the outrage which caused it; but in spite of this warning, and seemingly oblivious or indifferent to the peril to which they subjected our people on their own soil and in their own homes and places of business, these contending forces renewed the battle only a few days ago and during the present week, again resulting in the serious injury of several American citizens, and from the same cause. Mr. President, I presume these Mexican people have an inherent right to fight if they want to fight, and, generally speaking, to fight wherever they please on Mexican soil, but I deny that they have any shadow of right to deliberately enter into a furious conflict on the border line and within easy gunshot of populous American towns and cities, thus unavoidably and imminently endangering the lives and property of American citizens. I believe that an act of that kind is in effect an attack on Americans, and that it presents a case where the President would be justified in ordering our troops to take such action as might be necessary to put a stop to the fighting, even though it might lead to a struggle between the United States and Mexican forces. Mr. President, in situations like this, where two countries are separated as these two are separated, it should be a rule incorporated in the law of nations, if it is not by fair interpretation already so—a rule founded on high and just considerations of humanity and on the respect always due a neutral sovereign—that a zone of safety should be established and observed, within which the belligerents should not engage in battle. A violation of this rule should of itself be regarded as an act of such offensive and hostile indifference to the rights of the neutral nation as would justify it in taking instant and effective steps for its own protection.

The duties resting upon a neutral and a belligerent are reciprocal, and the duty of the one is as imperative as the duty of the other. William Edward Hall, in his work on international law, in speaking of the mutual obligations resting upon two sovereign States, one of which is engaged in war and the other of which is neutral, lays down this rule:

> Both are affected by the same duties as in peace time. The belligerent therefore remains under obligation to respect the sovereignty of the neutral. The neutral is under an equal obligation not to aid directly or indirectly, and within certain limits to prevent a State or private person from aiding in places under his control the enemy of the belligerent in matters immediately bearing on the war. If a wrong is done, the remedy is, of course, international.

Applying this sound and reasonable doctrine to the case immediately in hand, various, and sometimes intricate obligations, more or less particular in their nature and character, are imposed upon the United States to fairly and honestly maintain its attitude of neutrality; for example, it is the duty of the United States to use every reasonable precaution to prevent the organization of a hostile force on American territory for the purpose of invading Mexico to wage war in that country. On the other hand, it is equally the duty of Mexico to respect the sovereignty of the United States; for example, Mexico can not deploy its troops on American territory or use American territory in any way for the prosecution of the war upon which it is engaged, and the same rule is equally applicable to the Mexican revolutionists. The United States would have an undoubted right to regard such an invasion of their territory as an offensive and hostile act, and this Government would have an undoubted right to use whatever force might be necessary to resist such an intrusion. Reasoning from analogy, can it be contended that the opposing forces in Mexico can engage in battle on the very line separating the two countries, and employ their armaments—rifles, machine guns, and heavy artillery—in such a reckless manner as to result in the murder and dangerous wounding of American citizens and the destruction of American property on the American side of the dividing line? Can it be said that to cross the line on to American territory, not to attack Americans, but to obtain some advantage over the domestic enemy, would be an offense against the sovereignty of this country of so grave a character as would justify and even make it the duty of our Government on its own account and for the defense of its own integrity to use force in resisting and expelling the invaders, and yet have it said that to inflict such grievous injuries upon American citizens as I have indicated, and in the way indicated, does not afford a sufficient provocation or justification for offensive action on the part of our Government for the protection of its people? If that be true, then the territory of the United States is of higher concern and more sacred than the lives of our people.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to ask him a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish the Senator to understand me as controverting his proposition. It is a very delicate question he is discussing, but while he has been presenting the picture from one side, the other side has occurred to me, and I would ask the Senator what would be the view he would take if conditions were reversed? Suppose that in the city of El Paso there was a rebellion against the authority of the United States and the rebels had taken possession of El Paso, including the Government buildings, the customhouse, courthouse, and so forth, and defied the authority of the United States. It is perfectly manifest that that authority could only be reinstated and made good by the United States through armed force driving those rebels out of El Paso, and it could not possibly undertake to do so without in some way in the conflict endangering Mexican citizens on the other side of the border. I should like to inquire of the learned Senator—I repeat, not for the purpose of controversy, but for the purpose of getting his view on the subject—what would he think would be the duty of the United States under such circumstances—to desist from the effort to recover its authority in El Paso on the ground that American troops might possibly injure some Mexican citizens on the other side of the border? Would it be justified in saying that for all time—because what is true of a day would be true of a year or of ten years, or of a hundred years—these rebels shall be permitted to set up an independent government in El Paso, to defy the authority of the United States Government, to resist its authority, and to maintain themselves in that condition of defiance and rebellion, because in the effort to reestablish its authority the United States must necessarily in such conflict endanger some persons on the opposite side of the Mexican border? I should like to know what the Senator would think would be the duty of the American Government under such circumstances?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think the actual cases stated by me and the supposititious one stated by the Senator from Georgia are parallel. I premise what I have to say by way of answer with this observation: That I would be most grievously surprised and disappointed if the United States, whatever else they might do, should, in the case supposed, so use their forces as to endanger the lives of the people of Mexico across the border or to destroy their property. I would consider the obligation upon the part of the United States to respect the sovereignty of Mexico in every respect as great as I hold it to be the duty of Mexico to respect the sovereignty of the United States. We would have no better right to endanger the lives of Mexican citizens than they have to endanger the lives of our citizens. As to what we could do in the case supposed, I will say, to begin with, that the United States would be abundantly able in their own way to take possession of El Paso without inflicting such an injury as I have described upon the neighboring and neutral sovereign. We could resort to some means of isolating the town of El Paso and so controlling its approaches that its early fall would be inevitable. Moreover——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the only way by which you could isolate the town so as not to endanger the Mexican people would be to move it away from the Mexican border, which I do not suppose would be practicable.

Mr. STONE. I do not see why it would be necessary to move it away to isolate it. We could——

Mr. BACON. To isolate it so that a fight going on between contending parties would not endanger the adjacent territory, you would have to move it away from the adjacent territory.

Mr. STONE. I think not; but in any event I hold that unless in the case stated the United States could advance and attack from one side or the other, or from two sides, instead of in the front, and so as not to endanger the lives of the people in Mexico, then the United States would do better not to move at all. If our forces should make an attack like that made by Mexicans near Douglas, and with like effect, I hold that the Government of Mexico would have not only a right to protest, but, if the protest proved unavailing, to take such steps as that Government might deem necessary for the protection of its own people and its own sovereignty, and in so doing would be justified by the considerate judgment of mankind. The United States could not, in order to maintain its own peace and sovereignty, invade the territory of a neighboring neutral State, or do any act that would amount to a hostile and offensive intrusion upon its rights or the rights and safety of its people. In a possible case like that it has been supposed might exist at El Paso, the forces of this Government could surround the city, provided it could not be attacked without danger to the peaceable residents of Jaurez and thus cut it off from all communication with or aid from the outside in the American interior. As to the opposite side of the line we would have a right, in the circumstances of the case, to ask and to expect Mexico, as a friendly neutral power, not to give aid to our enemy, directly or indirectly, by permitting the rebellious forces resisting our authority to use its borderland and resources so as to thwart our efforts to suppress the revolt. It would be the duty of Mexico to aid us in that behalf to the fullest extent. The obligations of two friendly sovereignties are always mutual.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I would say that my view would be this: Every government has the right to protect itself against insurrection, and it has the right to go to any extent and resort to every means that shall be necessary to accomplish that result. If, in the accomplishment of that result, it injures its neighboring sovereignty, it is, of course, liable for the damages; but to say that if there is——

Mr. STONE. The Senator will permit me to say that he is undoubtedly right that in such a case the Government would be liable in damages, but that would afford poor comfort to the citizen who had been slain or to his dependent family.

Mr. BACON. That is all true, Mr. President. Every country has a right to go to war with any other country whenever, in its judgment, circumstances warrant; and if in the effort to reestablish the authority of the United States Government in the city of El Paso the United States in attacking the rebels in El Paso should inflict such injury upon the people of Mexico as to make the Government of Mexico think that it was a casus belli, that would be, of course, a circumstance under which they would be acting on their own responsibility, and the same is true with the conditions reversed. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STONE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BACON. If this is a sufficient casus belli, we have a right to go to war upon it; but the point about which I differ from the Senator is his suggestion, if I understand him correctly, that under such circumstances the President would have the right, upon his own motion, without a declaration of war by Congress, to invade the territory of Mexico with the Army. To that I do not agree, and I have no idea that the President would do so.

Mr. STONE. I have already stated what I understand the President's view to be upon that subject, and have also stated my own impressions as to his limitations, and this it is unnecessary to repeat.

The President's restraint in the face of the exasperating circumstances I have recounted illustrates his judicial temperament, and perhaps shows that he acted more wisely than my suggestion would imply he might properly and constitutionally have acted. But, without stopping to quibble about that or about any other minor consideration, we face the fact that Congress is now in session. Because the Congress is in session, no doubt the President thinks he has already gone as far as he should go without congressional sanction and authority, and in that he may be fundamentally right. The question, Mr. President, is now up to Congress. What are we going to do about it? I have presented the pending resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make speedy inquiry into and report upon the facts connected with this grave and momentous international situation. When considerations so serious as those we are now considering are involved, it becomes us to move with caution and deliberation; but the exigencies of the situation likewise demand that we should act with reasonable dispatch. I framed the resolution as it is, rather than to put it in a more drastic form, so that the subject might be remitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, among the membership of which committee are many of the most erudite and distinguished Members of this body, and so that the Senate might have the benefit of their united wisdom in outlining the policy our Government should adopt in this emergency. Perhaps I should refrain from going further at this time in expressing an opinion as to what the Congress ought to do. Nevertheless, I am going to say, whether I do right or wrong in saying it, that the Congress should at once and without delay authorize the President to employ whatever force may be necessary to prevent a repetition of the bloody outrage committed at Douglas, Ariz., and a repetition of which is threatened at El Paso, Tex. The President should be authorized by formal action, and the Congress should express its opinion in positive terms that it is his duty to use whatever force the circumstances may require to protect our people on their own territory and in their own homes from danger. His authority in this behalf should be extended far enough and have sufficient latitude to fully warrant him in using our military forces in whatever way he may deem expedient and necessary to accomplish the desired end, even though it should lead to an intrusion upon Mexican territory. Moreover, if any act done under this authority by the President for the proper protection of our own people on our own soil should lead to hostile demonstrations against American citizens resident in the interior of Mexico, the President should be authorized, not now perhaps, but later on, to use the military forces of the United States, if that is found to be necessary, to protect the lives and liberty of peaceable American citizens, wherever domiciled in any quarter of Mexico. Perhaps, as I have said, I might better have deferred this expression of opinion until a later date; but, after all, it seems to me that the time is here when no harm can come, but possibly good may come, in speaking out without too much reserve. I appreciate the importance of not offending the pride and sensibilities of others, but, above that, I am still more concerned about the protection of American men, women, and children from dangers that can well be characterized as the outgrowth of recklessness and brutality.

Mr. President, I greatly hope that the occurrence at Agua Prieta will not have its counterpart at any other point on the border line. I greatly hope that if the authority I have indicated should be given to the President by act of Congress no occasion will arise for asserting it. As a neighbor and friend of the Mexican people I view with genuine sympathy and sorrow the spectacle of their country being torn by warring factions, its great industries prostrated, and all of its wonderful possibilities of progress indefinitely arrested. The injury being done to the good name and material welfare of Mexico can not be overestimated. I would be rejoiced to see the storm beating on this Republic pass away, and to see the sun of peace and prosperity shine upon that unhappy land again. No man more than I could more deeply regret any breach of the peace between the United States and Mexico, or more regret any interruption of the amicable relations so long existing between the two countries; but intelligent Mexicans must recognize the gravity of the situation and realize that no Government can owe a higher or more imperative duty than that of protecting its own people against wrongs from any source or however committed. If without fault of ours the Mexican people themselves create a condition that makes it necessary for this Government to assume an offensive attitude, they can not complain. If we are compelled against our own desire and even against our own interests to assume an attitude of hostility, then the just judgment of mankind will approve what we do. Whatever we do must be right, and being right we can safely proceed without fear.

Mr. President, it was my intention, at the conclusion of the remarks I gave notice I would make, to move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BACON. Before the motion is put, I desire to say a word.

Mr. STONE. Just let me say what I have in mind.

On reflection I recall that the Committee on Foreign Relations has not been organized for service at this session of Congress. There are several vacancies on the committee yet to be filled. When that will be done is somewhat problematical. I have no particular objection to having the resolution go now to the committee, if that course is desired.

Mr. CULLOM. There will probably not be a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations until the committee membership is filled, unless an emergency requires it.

Mr. STONE. I was going to suggest that possibly it might be as well to let the resolution lie on the table until the committee is organized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. BACON. I desire, before the matter passes from the consideration of the Senate, to be heard for a moment.

Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question at the present time, and would prefer, really, not to say anything about it until after it has had the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by which committee I know it will receive the most careful and conservative consideration; and I only trespass for a moment upon the time of the Senate in order that a position taken by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] may not go out to the country, by reason of any failure of expression to the contrary, as one shared unanimously, at least, I will say, by the Senate.

I do not yield to the Senator from Missouri in my recognition of the duty of the United States Government to protect its citizens both within our territory and, so far as may be proper, when they are within other jurisdictions; but I am not prepared to go to the extent of the Senator in the statement which he has made as to what he would conceive to be the authority which we should vest in the President at this time. So far as concerns the authority to protect citizens within our own borders, the President now has all the authority which Congress could confer upon him, so far as those acts are limited to actions within our own territory.

I do not desire to discuss it, for reasons which are manifest, and I make this statement now only for the reason I have already suggested, to prevent misconstruction as to the views which some of us may have upon this subject. I do not think the time has come, or that any events which are reasonably to be anticipated will bring that time, when Congress should vest in the President of the United States, in his discretion, the power to use the Army in Mexico for any of the purposes which have been indicated by the Senator from Missouri. That is a declaration of war. Whenever Congress authorizes the President of the United States to use the Army and Navy of the country in a foreign country, it is a declaration of war, and that is the most solemn and serious act which Congress can at any time take.

There are other methods of redress for wrongs which have been committed, and there are other methods of protection than the one suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I do not intend, as I repeat, to elaborate this or discuss it. I wish simply to express my dissent to that suggestion on the part of the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. ROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from New York permit me for just a minute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say that the resolution by its very terms provides that the Committee on Foreign Relations in considering it should report such recommendations as the committee deems advisable. My suggestions were merely an expression of my own views. But I have already said that I not only preferred but would insist upon taking the united judgment of this committee.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, before the subject is passed over and the resolution laid upon the table, I wish to express my entire dissent from the assumption which seemed to me to be carried by the expression of opinion on the part of the Senator from Missouri. Granting that injuries have been done to American citizens which ought to be redressed, that wounds have been inflicted, that lives have been taken, that property has been destroyed, it does not follow, sir, that we should begin the process of securing redress for those injuries by a threat of force on the part of a great and powerful nation against a smaller and weaker nation. That, sir, is to reverse the policy of the United States and to take a step backward in the pathway of civilization.

There is no reason whatever, sir, to assume, if injuries have been done of the kind described, that the Government of Mexico is unwilling to make due redress upon having those injuries and claims for redress presented to her in the ordinary course of peaceful negotiation; and the passage of such a resolution as has been described, equivalent to a declaration of war, would be to preface the ordinary demand—the demand which it is the duty of every civilized power to make upon a friendly nation—with a threat that if the demand is not complied with force will be used.

Sympathy with the people of Mexico in their distress, a just sense of the duties that we owe to that friendly people, and the duties that we owe to the peace of the world must forbid our assenting to or yielding to any such course.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not rise with any purpose of discussing the question which has been before the Senate, for I deprecate all such discussion, and I regret that there should have been any discussion about it. I think it most desirable that the condition of affairs in Mexico and our relations with those affairs should not be discussed in Congress at present. It seems to me to be in the interest of peace and of harmonizing the difficulties that now exist in Mexico that there should not be discussion in either branch of Congress about it.

I desire to call attention to one important point that has been somewhat overlooked. When the President remits to Congress a question of difference with another country, the last step but one has been taken before a declaration of war. The Congress can carry on no negotiations; it can do nothing of a diplomatic character. Congress has but one power in dealing with another nation, and that is the war power. And when a President remits to Congress a question of that character and Congress gives him the power to intervene, it is a practical assertion of the war power.

That is the exact course which was pursued in relation to Cuba when the war with Spain began. President McKinley remitted the question to Congress, saying substantially that diplomatic methods had failed, and we conferred upon him the right to intervene, and that amounted to war.

Mr. President, we have nothing but the kindest of feelings toward the Republic of Mexico. We all, I think, universally regret the disturbances that now exist there. We have no outstanding grievances against Mexico. We have no questions between the two countries. The unfortunate incidents at Douglass and on the border are the results of the disturbed conditions in our neighbor to the South, and it seems to me that in every possible way we should use our best efforts to help Mexico to settle those differences; that we should show the greatest consideration, and that we should avoid in every possible way anything that looks like a threat or a resort to force.

I sincerely hope that the question will not be discussed in Congress, because when the time comes that it must be discussed in Congress we shall have reached a very serious point, indeed, and therefore I trust that the matter may end here, for the present, at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution at this time, but merely to a question of practice, nor have I any objection to the resolution lying on the table if the Senator from Missouri desires to have it lie there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CULBERSON. My understanding, however, is that at the last session a resolution was adopted in effect continuing the committees of the Senate as organized in the Sixty-first Congress, and that it is proper to refer all these resolutions to committees now. That is the course I suggested this morning in introducing a resolution on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. During the absence of the Senator from Texas, the Senator from Missouri requested that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. I say I have no objection to that.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Missouri will move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. That is right.

Mr. STONE. It is immaterial to me whether the one course or the other is taken, and if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will now move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Illinois, as the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, so desires, I ask that the resolution be referred to that committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that in my judgment all matters of that sort, if discussed by the Senate, ought to be taken up in executive session. I did not think of making the necessary motion at the time, and I have no reason to feel now that we ought to have had the discussion in executive session, but in my judgment that ought to be the rule always.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 24, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 20, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth, who hast set Thy glory above the heavens. Open Thou our spiritual eyes, that we may behold the light of Thy countenance. Unstop our spiritual ears, that we may hear the music of Thy voice. Make more sensitive our hearts, that we may feel the fructifying influences of Thy love; that as we pass on we may strew our paths with the flowers of golden deeds, and at the end hear the words, which will be sweeter than all music, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of Thy Lord." For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INVESTIGATION OF THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Rules, submits a privileged report (H. Rept. 9), which the Clerk will read.

House resolution 103.

Resolved, That the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, in the Department of Agriculture, in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and on Public Buildings be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed to examine into all the affairs of said departments as fully as is permitted to them and made their duty to do by the Rules of the House relating to said committees, respectively. And the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary. And said committees, or any subcommittees thereof, shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance of witnesses and to examine them under oath, and send for records, books, and papers and all other evidence that may be necessary to make the investigation full and complete, and that the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress. Said committees or any subcommittees thereof shall have authority to sit during any recess of this Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Texas if this resolution is in the form in which it was submitted to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in reply to his question I will say that it is in the exact form which we agreed upon. The gentleman understands why I submit it at this time, and I ask for the adoption of it.

Mr. MADDEN. As the Clerk seems to have had some difficulty in reading the resolution, I ask unanimous consent to authorize the Committee on Rules to employ a stenographer, so that resolutions may be presented in such form that the Clerk may be able to read them readily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request is out of order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Those in favor of it——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. AUSTIN. I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this resolution a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the resolution provide for the necessary expenses of this investigation?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It does not include that, because that is left to the Committee on Accounts. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. I ask for recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker started to put the question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas must either fish or cut bait. He can move the previous question or yield the floor.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not understand that the gentleman desired any time. If he wants it, I will be glad to yield him some. There is no controversy, as I understand, about it.

Mr. MANN. All I wish to do is to ask a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. MANN. But when the Speaker starts to put the question, and the previous question has not been ordered, of course any gentleman is entitled to recognition. Does this resolution do anything that is not now authorized by the rules, except the matter of subpœnaing witnesses?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And authorizing the committees to sit during the recess of Congress and to go as far back in time as they may deem proper. I suppose they have that authority now.

Mr. MANN. I think they have that authority under the rules.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think so; but we thought there might be some question about it and we put it in the resolution. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Rules, and we think we have got about all the matters in that should be included.

Mr. MANN. Is one of the purposes of the resolution to lay a preamble for the bringing in of further resolutions for the appointment of clerks for these committees and to give them the power to print at the Government expense?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is no purpose in view except what is expressed in the resolution; that is all that is intended by it. The committees have certain power to print now.

Mr. MANN. I apprehend that it will be followed shortly by a resolution to provide clerks for these committees.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that is a part of the economy program.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Illinois imagine that these committees will be able to do any great amount of labor in investigating these departments for the last 15 years without several clerks to do the work? In the last Congress, although these committees did no work at all, they all had session clerks.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the gentleman from New York reported a resolution yesterday authorizing the appointment of seven or nine session clerks, some of which were employed heretofore by committees that are now abolished. I suppose that is a part of the economy program.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Texas will yield we will discuss that question when it is reached.

Mr. MANN. If we get a chance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And we will be able to satisfy the country, if not the gentleman from Illinois, of the propriety of these clerks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. You probably will be able to satisfy that side of the House that a little more patronage is to be distributed, but not the country that it is economy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to ask any further question? If not, Mr. Speaker, I will ask a vote on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 112.

Resolved, That the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, my recollection is that this committee has enjoyed this privilege heretofore.

Mr. HEFLIN. It has.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The resolution was considered and agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GRAY, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Robert L. Pruyn, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, this measure should be adopted for two general and fundamental reasons. First, because it is in line with evolution, with the laws of progress, and the spirit of the times. Secondly, because it is a step in the reform of our fiscal and economic policies.

Our generation has witnessed unprecedented progress in mechanical science and in the mechanic arts, and the greatest progress of all has been in the domain of transportation. This progress has largely removed the physical barriers which separate the peoples of the earth. In every case the bringing of peoples closer together, whether within the same nation or of different nations, has proved beneficial to all concerned, verifying the lesson of all history that anything that promotes the friendly intercourse of peoples has been of general benefit. The full control of nature's forces through science can only come from the full cooperation of man. The widening realization of this great fact is speedily undermining the destroying spirit between men and nations and is bringing forth a new era for the whole world. In this era it will be realized by all that it is not necessary to harm others in order to help oneself; not necessary to kill others in order to live. The bird of prey is fast disappearing; the beast of prey has seen his day; the man of prey is fast being crushed; the business of prey is being uprooted; nations of prey are losing their commerce and their colonies. The real test for fitness to survive is no longer the might and brute force to destroy, but the capacity and willingness to cooperate and to serve. The greatest among men is to be no longer the conqueror, but the servant of all.

This great principle of cooperation and service should more and more dictate the policies of nations in their relations with each other. A nation should desire the prosperity and seek to promote the happiness of its neighbors, and the service rendered in such a spirit is sure to come back manyfold like bread cast upon the waters. It sounded like a chapter from medievalism when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] read from the speech of the Canadian premier of the advantages that would accrue to Canada from reciprocity, and urged the advantages to Canada as a reason why this bill should not be adopted by America. It indicated the baleful effect of our high-tariff wall policy upon the political education of our people, that this semi-savage argument should have received even the limited applause it did receive from Republicans. America, of all nations in the world, should be the first, and not the last, to adopt toward other nations the policy of commercial as well as political good will. As every other nation prospers, just so it will be able to afford and will consume more and more of the great world staples of which we are the foremost producer; "prosperity and progress for all other nations" should be the very foundation maxim for our foreign relations. It is not only true moral ethics, but also sound business policy.

The Dominion of Canada and the United States have the longest contiguous frontier of any two peoples in the world—a frontier offering less of physical barrier than that offered by the Mississippi River between the peoples on its east and west banks. The two peoples are more closely bound by ties of blood and ties of institutions than any two peoples of the world. The sociological barriers are about as invisible as those between our peoples east of the Mississippi River and those west of it or those north of the Mason and Dixon line and those south of it. Both peoples look across the Atlantic to the nations of Europe and across the Pacific to the nations of Asia. Both are marching along parallel paths of destiny, and it was decreed at the foundation of the world that they should march hand in hand.

Whom God and nature have joined together would blinded man put asunder. The thought of maintaining a permanent artificial wall between these people is abhorrent. This treaty does not go far enough, but it does begin the work of demolition, and should be ratified.

The second fundamental reason why this measure should be adopted is that it starts us in the direction of placing our industries on a sound economic basis and of readjusting our fiscal policies. I will not at this juncture discuss the question of taxation, but will enunciate for the purpose of suggestion this proposition—that the indirect system of taxation in this country must progressively give way to the direct system. The indirect system is fundamentally out of accord with republican institutions, for it practically eliminates the people from the control of taxation, as they never know or realize when they are being taxed, or how much they are being taxed, or who amongst them is being most or least taxed, or who is getting the tax money, whether the Government or special individuals or interests. It is true the indirect method is the easiest method of getting tax money, and all the monarchical governments of the world resort to it, as they raise money without the people realizing it. But the very fact that the money comes easy and without the consciousness of the people, makes the governments less accountable to the people and tends to extravagance and even the use of the people's money to keep the yoke upon the people's neck. It is untenable to hold that the money necessary to maintain the Federal Government could not be raised by direct taxation. A patriotic people are willing to pay the money needed for a just and economical administration of a government which they themselves control.

The question of taxation lies deep in the body politic of every Nation. The power to tax becomes the power to govern, and is the greatest source of gain the world has ever seen. Such a power should rest in the hands of the people. In a republic the people must regulate and control it, or special interests will seize it and threaten the Nation's prosperity and its liberties. Heretofore America has adopted the indirect system for its Federal taxation, and as a consequence to-day we have a condition of Federal taxation about which the American people are ignorant behind our tariff wall. For every dollar of customs revenue that the Government collects to-day, it is estimated that private interests collect $7. No people would submit to such a system of taxation if they knew about it. This reciprocity bill is the first step along the path that will lead to the needed change in our system of taxation, and it is a step toward placing our industries on a more permanently sound basis.

The foundation for prosperity and greatness for a people of high industrial capacity is close access to nature's resources, from which to supply the means for subsistence and the materials for manufacture. Throughout the opposition to this measure and to all reform of the tariff runs the fear that we can not compete with the people of other lands.

Who are the American people that we should fear to accept competition with the world?

The eloquent remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, lately the Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON], on this floor yesterday give a complete answer. He stated that the people of the United States, about 92,000,000 in number, produce in agricultural products and in manufactured products, constituting the two great classes of products, about as much as the 350,000,000 of the peoples of Europe. He also stated that we spend for the education of the American people four and one-half tenths, nearly half the money spent for education in all the world.

Prof. William G. Clark, a noted economist, estimates that the annual output of the average American producer is $2,450 worth of wealth a year; the average for the Canadian is $1,456; the average for the Australian is $900; for the Frenchman, $640; for the Englishman, $556; for the German, $460; which gives the American a ratio of more than five times the productiveness of the average German, more than four times the productiveness of the average Englishman, more than three and a half times the productiveness of the average Frenchman, two and a half times the productiveness of the average Australian, and more than one and a half times the productiveness of the average Canadian.

To maintain and even increase this relatively great industrial capacity of our people we should not only continue to develop our educational system, particularly for the masses of our people who only reach elementary grades, turning our attention in these grades to industrial instruction, but we should bring in a wider market and keener competition. Our great industries should no longer be confined to the home market and relieved of competition, but should get the discipline of universal competition and should conquer the great markets of the whole world and escape the wide fluctuations of booms and depressions that are inevitable with a single market. Being sure of the industrial capacity of our people, the supreme consideration for our statesmen is to furnish them access to the natural resources of the world. For the undeveloped lands of the world our true policy is equal opportunity guaranteed by the "open-door policy," fair chance for all, colonization and political control by none. Toward the occupied and developed lands of the world our true policy is reciprocity. The most important people of all with whom we should have reciprocity are the people of Canada, whose products are largely supplemental to our own, who possess boundless resources within the shortest distances along natural lines of communication.

It seems almost incredible that any sensible man could maintain that having access to these vast and new resources would harm the American people. Under such a theory the great domain of the Western Reserve should never have been opened up for fear of adverse effects upon New England and the Atlantic seaboard. Under such a theory it was a grave mistake to open the vast stretch of country beyond the Mississippi River, a fatal mistake to make the Louisiana purchase, the Florida purchase, the Gadsden and Alaska purchases. Under the same theory it was fatal to the people of Kansas that Oklahoma was opened up; it is a fatal mistake for us to proceed with the extension of irrigation and the reclamation of arid regions of the West and Southwest.

The facts are that in every case the opening up of new resources not only built up the new country, but added to the prosperity of the older sections.

It is semiludicrous to hear such Members as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] pleading the cause of the American farmer. The chief opposition to this measure does not come from the consistent friends of the farmer, but from the apostles of a high prohibitive tariff, who in their zeal for the manufacturer have always fought the farmers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you analyze the motive behind the limited but desperate resistance to this measure you will find that it comes from those who fear to let the levee of high protection be broken even by a crawfish hole, and their fear is well grounded. This reciprocity treaty is the first real break in the levee of high protection. It will be followed by other breaks in rapid succession, and will lead to the revision of our fiscal policies and the placing of our industries on a sound economic basis by giving us, through a widening policy of reciprocity, a wider access to the natural resources of this hemisphere, and by giving our industries the discipline of competition and the conquest of the markets of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend at this juncture to discuss at length the unsound position in which our industries have been placed by the persistence of the policy of high protection. I will only point out what must be clear to anyone with a knowledge of human nature, that an industry getting the large profits within a high protective wall will not be interested in the business of world's markets beyond, where the profits under competition are comparatively small. Instead of going out for the larger markets, the men controlling the industry will spend most of their time stifling competition at home, so as to gain full benefit of these tariff walls. After filling the home market the industry stops developing. For more than 10 years the industries of America have been hampered in their development. With our great natural resources supplying the raw materials and the power, and with the wonderful skill and adaptability of our people, our industries ought to have gone out these last 10, 12, or 15 years to the conquest of the markets of the world. The profits on a single article would have been smaller but the volume of business would have been much greater. The industries would have grown beyond anything in their experience, while the whole American people would have gotten the benefit of lower cost of living. They would have required vastly more laborers and the increased demand for labor would have raised the price of wages far beyond the present level. The astounding fallacy is advanced that this policy of continued high protection has been adopted for the protection of American labor, when in all the legislation on the books of the land you will not find one clause imposing a tariff on the importation of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Labor is the one thing in this country that has never received the real consideration of the priest of high protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the contrary, the evidence is full and complete that vast interests getting the benefit of the high tariff wall, and relieved of competition themselves, are the very agencies that have encouraged, if they have not subsidized, the influx of vast hordes of labor from Europe all on the free list. They have encouraged the sending over of the cheapest labor of Europe. They have gathered up the paupers in the highways and byways, and, dumping them on our shores, they did not guide them to the fields in need of cultivation, but directed their footsteps to the mine and the factory, and there the pauper labor of Europe has stood upon the neck and shoulder of American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have been accused of being afraid of other nations in behalf of my own country. I have studied America in comparison with other nations, and our civilization in comparison with theirs, and two great facts stand out. First, the weakness of our civilization, a weakness shown by every Republic since the world began, is the lack of preparation for military defense. Secondly, the strength of our civilization is economic, and lies in our commercial and industrial productiveness.

In what is being added to the increase of the world's wealth by industrial labor, America to-day is adding the equivalent of almost all of the rest of the world combined. We need never fear for our country in a fair competition in the markets of the world. The American who can produce four times as much as any man in the world need not fear the labor competition of the pauper. I will tell these gentlemen who plead for American labor that an American unarmed can not meet even a pauper armed. We need not fear for our country in the domain of its irresistible commercial and industrial strength, but our concern should be to safeguard the Nation in the line of its great weakness, lack of measures for defense. Our concern should be to see to it that our American man of peace who goes unarmed has a fair chance in the markets of the world, and is allowed to continue unmolested his peaceful productiveness which places him beyond the competition of all of the rest of the people of the earth. The true, sound, and wise policy for us to pursue at this juncture is to try to insure that this peaceful civilization of ours shall not be interfered with in its progress by the military power that others have prepared, though weaker in resources, and then, to lay the foundation for a permanent industrial greatness through the further educational development of our people, through the discipline of competition in the markets of the world, and through access to the great natural resources and the markets of the world. And this would dictate the adoption of this resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to express to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] my appreciation of this opportunity to say a few words upon the pending question. As a new Member of this House, conscious of my inability to add anything new to this discussion, I am loath either to occupy your time or ask for your indulgence. My only excuse is that I represent a constituency that is perhaps interested more directly in this measure than any other community in the United States.

The district I have the honor to represent is practically unanimous for the passage of the pending measure. The city of Detroit, with a population of 465,000 people, is perhaps more directly and vitally interested in the ratification of this agreement than any other community in the United States. Our manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and laboring classes generally, with complete unanimity, are asking for freer commercial intercourse with Canada. The people of Detroit are an intelligent people; they have given careful and earnest consideration to this question. They do not ask for Canadian reciprocity solely because they believe it will benefit them, but because it will prove an advantage to the entire country. They recognize it as a national and not a local question. They are intelligent enough to realize the community of interest that exists between the city and the farm. If they believed the ratification of the proposed agreement would seriously affect the great agricultural classes they would not favor it. In short, they understand that the prosperity of agriculture is essential to the happiness and contentment of all our people.

The city of Detroit is but 2,600 feet away from our Canadian neighbors. It is estimated by the immigration authorities that about 3,500 people from Windsor, Walkerville, and Sandwich cross the Detroit River daily and earn their livelihood in Detroit. It is also estimated that about 1,400 Detroit people cross the river each day and earn their livelihood upon the Canadian side. The freest thing that crosses and recrosses that great artery of commerce is labor, and with free trade in labor we feel that we have a right to insist upon free trade in the products of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I wish to advert to the statements made by enemies of reciprocity on the Canadian side that this measure is merely the forerunner of annexation. If there is any sentiment in this country in favor of annexation with Canada it ought to be found in Detroit; but it can not be discovered there, because it does not exist. This talk of annexation is inspired merely for the purpose of frightening the people of Canada and defeating the ratification of the proposed reciprocal agreement.

Much has been said upon this floor of the disaster that will overtake the farmers if this measure becomes a law. Much has been said of the evil effects of opening our markets to Canadian wheat, grown, as the opponents of this measure tell us, upon cheap land by cheap labor. To my mind these fears are unfounded. I have always believed, and believe now, that when a country produces more of a given commodity than it can consume the surplus must find a market abroad and the price abroad will regulate the price at home. If this be true, it matters not, so far as the effect upon our market is concerned, whether Canadian wheat is grown upon cheap land or dear land. Both the United States and Canada produce a surplus of wheat which must be sold abroad. The Canadian surplus meets the American surplus in the markets of Liverpool and London. Does anybody in these markets ever inquire whether this or that particular wheat was grown upon cheap land or dear land; by cheap labor or dear labor? [Applause on the Democratic side.] In many of the counties of Michigan you may find farms valued at $50 per acre and farms valued at $100 per acre. The wheat grown upon each of these farms is hauled to the same market and sold at the same price.

In considering the price of wheat we are considering a world-wide proposition. If my position is correct, the importation to-morrow of every bushel of Canadian wheat into the United States would not break the American market. There would be the same number of bushels of wheat and the same number of mouths to feed. The abnormal demand created in Canada by the withdrawal of her wheat would maintain the price here. The farmer does not fix the price of his wheat. He does not figure the interest on his investment, the cost of seed and labor, and say to the consumer, "You may have it for so much." The price of wheat is fixed by the law of supply and demand, and speculation is the only thing that can interfere with the operation of that law. A tariff upon wheat benefits no one except the gambler who would "corner" his country's supply of wheat. [Applause.]

The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], for whom I have the highest respect, and whose popularity at home is attested by his long-continued service here, contended that the tariff upon wheat raised the price. With much eloquence he declared that he was opposed to farming "on shares" with Canada and selling the surplus abroad. I think perhaps the gentleman's argument is influenced somewhat by environment and force of habit. I have lived all my life among Michigan Republicans. Knowing them as I do, and having witnessed the regularity with which they roll up their 100,000 majority at every election, I am convinced that they are opposed to doing anything on shares. He declared in the course of his eloquent speech that as the Canadian farmers paid nothing to support our schools and build our highways and bridges, they should be forced to contribute something to maintain the Government when they availed themselves of our markets. If the gentleman is correct when he says the tariff upon wheat raises the price, it may be pertinent to inquire who does the contributing, the Canadian producer of wheat or the American consumer of bread? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the opponents of this measure are right and the tariff does actually raise the price of wheat, it ought not to be imposed. A high price for wheat means a high price for flour, a high price for flour means a high price for bread, and, Mr. Chairman, a tax on bread is a crime against humanity. The loaf is small enough now. Had I the power I would make it larger instead of smaller.

While the ratification of this agreement will not and can not lower the price of wheat, it will, in my judgment, have a tendency to reduce the cost of living, especially in the towns and cities adjacent to the Canadian border. I certainly hope so. At certain seasons of the year, and when market conditions are favorable, we ought to be able to get more butter, more eggs, more potatoes, more poultry, more vegetables. In the consideration of this question we ought to look conditions squarely in the face. It was but a few years ago when the farmers constituted one-half our population. To-day they constitute but one-third. Population has been centralizing in the large industrial centers, and this country to-day is short on food and long on manufactures. What we need is more food and a broader market. I am in favor of this measure because I believe it will have a tendency to give us both. [Applause.]

The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], in the course of one of the most scholarly speeches on this question to which it has been my good fortune to listen, declared that the farm was a home as distinguished from a factory. I think that is true. The American farm is the finest home upon which the sun shines—and the American farmer is the most independent man within the confines of the two oceans. In all his experience he has never felt the pangs of hunger, and never will. With his broad, fertile acres he is never called upon to worry over where the next meal is coming from for his wife and his children. I do not believe the time will ever come in this country when, in order to make one-third of our population prosperous and contented, it will be necessary to visit privation and want upon the remaining two-thirds. If so, there is something fundamentally wrong with our industrial and social system.

Free trade has made the United States a great manufacturing and agricultural Nation. More commerce passes through the Detroit River in eight months than enters and clears the ports of New York, Boston, Liverpool, and Glasgow in an entire year. If you seek the great contributing cause of this country's marvelous growth, you will find it in that provision of the Federal Constitution which guarantees free trade between the States. What reasons exist for freedom of commerce between the States which can not be urged with equal force for freedom of commerce between the United States and Canada? To my mind there is no more excuse for a commercial barrier between these two countries than there is for a commercial barrier between Ohio and Michigan or between the upper and lower peninsulas of Michigan. [Applause.]

This measure would benefit the American farmer by enlarging the market for many of his products. Canada is not, and never will be, a great fruit-producing country. For the year ending March 31, 1910, we sold to Canada 59,000 barrels of apples against a tariff of 40 cents per barrel. We sold her peaches to the amount of 4,797,000 pounds against a tariff of $1 per 100 pounds. We sold her quinces, apricots, and pears to the amount of 4,941,000 pounds against a tariff of 50 cents per 100 pounds. We sold her cherries to the amount of 318,680 pounds against a tariff of 2 cents per pound. We sold her clover and timothy seed to the amount of $748,742 against a tariff of 10 per cent ad valorem. With the tariff against these and other products removed we would be able to sell Canada much more.

Some gentlemen on the other side are worrying over the future of the bean growers of this country if this measure should become a law. The total Canadian bean crop for 1909 was 1,324,600 bushels. Why, Mr. Chairman, the State of Michigan alone raises annually five times this quantity of beans. The production of beans in Canada is so small, compared with our own production, that the farmer has little to fear on that score.

The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], whose judgment I would be willing to accept on almost any question except the tariff, is much worried over the fate that will befall the hay producers of this country in the event this reciprocity agreement is ratified. He fears the Canadians will be able to flood our markets with cheap hay. Let us consider the hay question for a moment. In 1909 the Canadian farmers produced 11,877,100 tons of hay and sold it at an average price of $11.14 per ton. In 1909 the total American yield was 64,938,000 tons, the product selling at an average price of $10.62 per ton. In 1908 the total Canadian yield was 11,450,000 tons, selling at an average price of $9.96 per ton. In the United States the total yield for that year was 70,798,000 tons, selling at an average price of $8.98 per ton. My authority for these statements are the Canada Yearbook for 1909 and the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1909. It would not appear from these figures that the American hay producer would be in any immediate danger from ruin by Canadian competition. In this connection I wish to direct attention to the fact that progressive American farmers to-day are not raising hay for the market, but are feeding it to their stock, and thus putting it back upon the land. They have learned by experience that they can make more money by this process than by selling their hay.

Reciprocity with Canada is no experiment. Under the reciprocity treaty of 1854 both manufactures and agriculture prospered as they never did before. In 1854, the year the treaty was ratified, our exports to Canada were $15,533,101. In 1862 they had increased to $25,173,157. In 1854 Canada sold to us to the amount of $8,649,002. In 1862 she sold us to the amount of $15,063,730—a balance of trade in our favor for that year of over $10,000,000. In 1853, the year before the treaty, our imports from the Provinces were $7,550,718, and our exports thereto were $13,140,642—a balance in our favor of less than $6,000,000. The change was so great in 1855, the year after the treaty, that our exports increase to $27,806,020, or more than double those of 1853. As our imports in 1855 from the Provinces were $15,136,734, the balance of trade in our favor was $12,600,000, or more than we ever sold to Canada before in any single year, except one.

Mr. Chairman, if this measure will increase the Nation's supply of food, it ought to be passed without delay. [Applause.] The millions who reside in our large cities are entitled to some relief from existing conditions. They are at the mercy of the great trusts that stifle competition and fix the price of nearly every item of human necessity. They buy their cotton goods at prices fixed by the Cotton Goods Trust; woolen goods at prices fixed by the Woolen Goods Trust; hosiery at prices fixed by the Hosiery Trust; products of iron and steel at prices fixed by the Iron and Steel Trust; rubber goods at prices fixed by the Rubber Trust; meats at prices fixed by the Meat Trust. They work for wages fixed by the law of supply and demand and buy the plainest necessities of life in a restricted market controlled to a large extent by these great combinations. Rapidly advancing prices have so decreased the purchasing power of a dollar during recent years that the struggle for existence has become a particularly hard one.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the days of high protection in this country are almost numbered. Henry Clay, the ablest apostle of protection in American history, entered the Senate of the United States in 1806, and for 30 years contended that the Government should protect by tariff legislation our young and growing industries. He never contemplated, however, that a high protective tariff would be imposed forever. He believed that the time would come when our manufacturing industries would be upon an independent footing and be able to defend themselves successfully against foreign competition. In 1832 he introduced a tariff bill which provided for a gradual reduction of duties until 1842, by which time he estimated that the tariff would be upon a revenue basis, or an average ad valorem duty of about 20 per cent. Imagine his surprise, could he return to earth, upon learning that the so-called stand-pat element of the Republican Party, masquerading as the friends of American labor and assuming to be advocates of the principle for which he contended nearly a hundred years ago, had succeeded in fastening upon this country a tariff largely in excess of that for which he contended when our industries were young.

Protection as represented by the Payne-Aldrich bill is an instrument of oppression and a badge of dishonesty. It fetters legitimate business, curtails the world's markets for our products, burdens the consuming millions, and robs labor of its honest reward. It was not designed to protect American labor. It was designed to give to the American manufacturing and producing trusts an advantage to which they are not entitled, and by which they are to-day plundering the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us pass the pending measure and relieve, if we can, the oppressive conditions that burden our great industrial classes. Why continue to legislate against trade, the only thing that ever made a nation industrially or financially great? The time has gone by when the American people can live by trading among themselves. The much-vaunted home-market theory of 30 years ago will not do to-day. The great need of the present is a larger market for our surplus products. It is said that our cotton mills can turn out in six or seven months enough goods to supply the American people for a year. The surplus must find a market abroad or the mills will close. The prosperity of this country is dependent upon the prosperity of other countries. Strike down, if you please, one-third or one-quarter of the manufacturing industries of England and Continental Europe and the fires will die out in our own furnaces and the American farmers' surplus will go a begging in the markets of the world.

Let us abandon the policy of exclusion and retaliation and usher in the spirit of peace, commerce, and friendly trade relations with our neighbors. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM].

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, I propose in the time allotted me to confine myself strictly to the concrete proposition which is now before this body. This is a bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada. Under the terms of the Payne Tariff Act the maximum tariff of the United States would have become effective against Canada on April 1, 1910, unless prior to that time the President of the United States had proclaimed that the Canadian tariff did not discriminate against the United States. It should be remembered that the last tariff bill as it passed the House provided for a maximum and minimum tariff, and that all countries should be entitled to our minimum tariff, and the maximum tariff was to be applied only to countries that practiced tariff discrimination against the United States. The Senate, however, amended the theory of the maximum and minimum provision so that the maximum tariff should be applied to all countries unless the President of the United States should be satisfied, and so proclaimed, that no undue discrimination existed in the tariff of any country against the United States. The difference between the House bill and the Senate bill in this regard was radical, and, in my humble judgment, the position of the House upon the question was more consistent with our theory of the tariff than the position of the Senate. However, the adoption of the conference report on the last tariff bill carried with it the adoption of the Senate provision in regard to the maximum and minimum tariff.

The negotiations between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, with a view of giving the former the benefit of the minimum tariff rates of our law, offered an opportunity for the President of the United States to indicate to the representatives of Canada the willingness of the administration to take up the question of an agreement between the two countries for reciprocal trade relations between them. I am convinced that the President, in making this suggestion to the representatives of Canada, acted in conformity with the overwhelming public sentiment of the people of the United States. I am convinced that, disregarding all selfish interests and looking at the question from the broad standpoint of national policy, the President of the United States in taking the initiative in negotiating and in consummating a trade agreement with our neighbor, Canada, which provides mutual trade advantages, rendered a service which will stand out as a conspicuous accomplishment of his administration. [Applause.]

In prophesying the effect upon the commerce between the two countries which the ratification of the pending agreement will have we have the record of the years between 1854 and 1866, when the Elgin-Marcy reciprocity treaty was in force. Notwithstanding that during the greater portion of that period the growth of our commerce with all countries, owing to the Civil War, was necessarily seriously interrupted, yet the record of the increase of trade between Canada and the United States under this reciprocity treaty is indisputable. The opponents of the present legislation have intimated that the abrogation of the Elgin-Marcy treaty in 1866 was due to a depressing effect upon certain American interests by reason of Canadian competition. I think, however, that a fair consideration of the question will lead the unbiased mind to the conclusion that the chief factor which led to the abrogation of that treaty in the year 1866 was because of the attitude of Great Britain toward the United States during the Civil War. It can hardly be disputed that the intense antipathy of the people of the United States toward Great Britain and Canada because of the attitude of the British Empire toward the United States during the Civil War contributed largely to the abolition of this treaty, and thus marked a historical step backward in the trade relations between the two countries.

The agreement with Canada now before us is more comprehensive than the Elgin-Marcy treaty and includes commodities of various classes.

Briefly speaking, the provisions of the agreement now pending may be summarized as follows:

First. Reciprocal free lists on leading primary food products, such as wheat and other grain; dairy products; fresh fruits and vegetables; eggs and poultry; fish, cattle and sheep, and live animals; and tin plate. Also certain commodities now free in one country are to be made free by the other, for instance: Cotton-seed oil will go free into Canada, and rough lumber will come free into the United States. Barbed-wire fencing is to be admitted free into the United States.

Second. Mutual reduced identical rates on secondary food products, such as fresh meats, canned meats, bacon and hams, lard and lard compounds, canned vegetables, cereals, and other foodstuffs partly manufactured.

Third. Mutual reduced rates on a list of manufactured commodities, including motor vehicles, cutlery, clocks and watches, sanitary fixtures, satchels and leather goods, plate glass, brass band instruments, printing ink, and miscellaneous articles. Under this head, also, Canadian duties on agricultural implements are reduced to the present United States rates.

Fourth. On certain commodities special rates by each country are made, as, for example, Canada reduces her duty on coal and cement, while the United States reduces its duties on iron ore, dressed lumber, aluminum products, and so forth.

In order to get a comprehensive idea of the effect of the agreement in a broad sense, it is necessary to refer somewhat briefly to statistics and figures.

The following statistics and figures are taken by me from a speech delivered by John Ball Osborne, Chief of the Bureau of Trade Relations, Department of State, before the Economic Club of Portland, Me., on March 15 last, and they show that the present foreign trade of the Dominion of Canada amounts to $655,000,000, of which the imports are valued at $375,800,000 and the exports at $279,200,000; exactly 50 per cent, or one-half of the total trade of Canada, to wit, $327,700,000, is with the United States, while 36 per cent, or $234,800,000, is with the United Kingdom, the balance of the trade being with other countries.

Of the total importations into Canada just given above, and amounting to $375,800,000, the United States furnishes $223,500,000, or 59.4 per cent, of the total imports into that country; the United Kingdom imports 25.3 per cent, amounting to $95,800,000; the balance of the imports are from other countries.

Of the total Canadian exports Great Britain and the United Kingdom receive approximately one-half, or $139,500,000; the United States comes next, with 37.3 per cent, amounting to $104,200,000; while the balance goes to various countries.

A study of our foreign markets shows that the Dominion of Canada stands third as a foreign market for the exports of the United States, being in this respect surpassed only by the United Kingdom and Germany. However, as a source of our imports Canada stands sixth, being surpassed by five countries, namely, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Cuba, and Brazil.

These statistics show the great importance of our trade with the Dominion of Canada. The showing is remarkable when we consider both the highly protective and the preferential features of the Canadian customs tariff. Since 1897 Canada has had highly protective rates, and at the same time has had preferential tariffs to the mother country and conventional tariffs with other countries, which have undoubtedly hampered the freedom of commerce between Canada and the United States.

The preferential rates which Canada offered to the mother country in 1897 were, first, a flat rebate of 12.5 per cent. This preferential rate was increased in 1898 to 25 per cent and then again in 1900 to 33.33 per cent in favor of the mother country, and has averaged about that rate since. Notwithstanding these preferences, the commerce of the United States with Canada has constantly grown, and, with the removal of the barriers provided for in the pending agreement, I am satisfied that the growth of commerce between the two countries will be by leaps and bounds. [Applause.] If the commerce of the United States with Canada has actually increased as statistics show, and we have, in fact, a greater share in the markets of Canada than the mother country, who can predict the share in that commerce which the United States would obtain should the agreement under consideration be enacted into law? [Applause.]

I said a moment ago that the United States now furnishes 59.4 per cent of the total imports into Canada and the United Kingdom 25.3 per cent. In 1884 England furnished approximately 40 per cent of the Canadian imports, while the United States at that time furnished between 46 and 47 per cent. In other words, the percentage share of England in the imports of Canada decreased, notwithstanding the preferential tariffs granted, from approximately 40 per cent of the total imports in 1884 to approximately 25 per cent in 1910, while during the same period, notwithstanding the highly protective tariff of Canada, the percentage share of the United States in the imports of Canada increased from approximately 46 or 47 per cent in 1884 to nearly 60 per cent in 1910.

These extraordinary, striking figures, under the conditions, demonstrate the enormous advantage and value of our commerce with Canada, and they clearly indicate that the mutual advantages to the two countries will be of incalculable benefit to each when freer trade relations, such as is contemplated by the agreement under consideration, are made a reality.

The large and important commerce which the United States now enjoys with the Dominion of Canada, notwithstanding the tariff barriers between the two countries and the preferential convention tariffs granted by Canada to other nations, justifies the belief that with the removal of these barriers to the extent provided in the agreement which we are now considering the commerce will be enormously augmented to the mutual advantage of both countries.

The policy of reciprocity has been a subject that has come before the American people frequently. I can not recall of a proposal for reciprocity with any country within recent years but what has met with violent opposition. A study of our various reciprocity agreements which have been presented for consideration fails to disclose with any degree of accuracy that they have been based upon any definite policy; that is, it can not be accurately stated that the reciprocity agreements heretofore negotiated by Republican Presidents have been confined to noncompeting products. Certainly all of the reciprocity treaties negotiated by the McKinley administration and known as the "Kasson treaties" provided for reciprocity in competing articles. I have a very vivid memory of these treaties, because they were pending for ratification at the time I entered Congress, 12 years ago. A large number of these treaties ruthlessly sacrificed many important California industries, and I had occasion to study their terms with a considerable degree of care, and pride myself that to some extent I had something to do with their defeat. To declare, therefore, as it has been done on this floor during the consideration of this agreement, that McKinley stood only for reciprocity in noncompeting articles is certainly not historically true, if we are to consider, as we must, that he approved of the acts of his own administration. It seems to me that the conclusion which every fair-minded man must reach is that the only safe way in considering reciprocity agreements is to consider each agreement by itself. In other words, each reciprocity agreement must stand alone.

The language of McKinley, in his last Buffalo address, in no sense bears out the assertion that he was opposed to reciprocity in competing products. I quote the gist of that speech:

A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities—a mutual exchange—is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade.

We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the position of the Republican Party in the past, and whatever may have been the real sentiments of McKinley and the other great leaders of the party upon the question of reciprocity, it seems to me that at this time there is no occasion for division of sentiment upon this question because the Republican Party, in its last national convention, which is the last authoritative declaration of the party upon the subject, and should therefore be the guide of the party, made a definition of the policy of protection, when, in substance, it declared that the tariff should be limited for the purposes of protection to the difference between the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad, with a reasonable profit to the American producer.

I am willing, Mr. Chairman, that my vote for or against the pending measure shall be determined by the principle of the last Republican national platform. [Applause.] If anyone can convince me that the difference in the cost of production of any of the articles mentioned in the pending agreement is substantially less in Canada than the cost of the production of the same articles in this country, then I should feel that under the definition of protection in the last national platform, as a Republican, I was bound to vote against the measure. But my study of the agreement and the evidence submitted convinces my mind that there is no substantial difference. I agree with President Taft, who said in his speech at Springfield, Ill., on February 11 last.

The conditions of production and of manufacture in the United States and Canada are substantially the same. Wages may differ in one part of Canada from another part, just as wages differ in different States in this country, but taken by and large, the character of the laborers, their intelligence and their skill, and the price paid them per unit of work, are not substantially less in Canada than they are in this country. * * * With that in view, still adhering loyally and sincerely to the principles of protection where it is needed to maintain our important industries, I did not hesitate to give the widest latitude to the Secretary of State and the commissioners who represented this country in offering to Canada a reduction of duties on goods and products coming into this country from Canada in consideration of the establishment of the same duty, or freedom from duty, on similar goods going into Canada.

After having made several visits to Canada myself I am convinced that the advantage is with the producer in the United States in competition with his competitor in Canada, generally speaking. The long, severe winters of Canada, the distance of the Canadian producer from the consuming centers of population, place a handicap upon the Canadian that greatly inures to the benefit of his American competitor. Of course there may be exceptions to this rule, but I am satisfied that, speaking broadly, the cost per unit of production of the competing articles provided for in the agreement under consideration are at least no greater, if not less—and, in my opinion, less—than in Canada, and in this view the report of the Tariff Board, set forth in Senate Document No. 849, Sixty-first Congress, third session, is a substantial confirmation.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not this measure conforms, so far as paper is concerned, with the last Republican platform?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I think it does.

Mr. DALZELL. You think there is no difference between the cost of making paper in Canada and in this country?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I think there is no substantial difference.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no substantial difference!

Mr. NEEDHAM. The report of the board, however, is before the Congress, and Members can determine it for themselves, but my study of the agreement and of this evidence convinces me that there is no substantial difference.

I find quite a few of the Members of this House who are now violently opposed to the pending agreement on the ground that it is an abandonment of the policy of protection were very substantial promoters and sponsors in passing through this House the legislation necessary to provide for reciprocity with Cuba. How the gentlemen referred to can reconcile their action is quite a mystery to me. Who will pretend that the labor conditions in Cuba are in any sense equal to our own, or that they in any degree approach the labor conditions in Canada? I opposed with what little ability I possessed the legislation providing for reciprocity with Cuba, because I felt it was an abandonment of the principle of protection, and because I felt an apprehension that the competition of the industries of that island would be injurious to the industries of the State of which I have had the honor to, in part, represent upon this floor for over 12 years. But our experience thus far under the policy of reciprocity with the Cuban Republic has not as yet had the effect such as I feared, and I have a strong conviction that the disastrous results which I apprehended may never materialize, and I am constrained to prophesy that the dire disasters which are apprehended by those on this side of the Chamber as a result of the enactment of the legislation now under consideration will also fail to materialize.

Now that we Members of the Republican Party have adopted a definition limiting the application of the policy of protection so that in fixing tariff duties they shall equalize the cost of production in this country and abroad with a fair profit to the American producer, and as there is no other country in the world where the conditions of production are as near an equality with our own as the Dominion of Canada, I sincerely trust that we may enact this measure into law and thus test the productive capacity and the competing ability of our people along lines of production and competition on substantial equality of terms.

Firmly believing that the putting into effect of the agreement under consideration will harm no substantial industry, but, on the contrary, will bring mutual benefit to both Canada and our own country, I shall support this great measure of a Republican President and a Republican administration. [Applause.] If, however, this measure should be put into force and effect and shall prove by its actual operation that the prophesies of those who now oppose it have been well founded and that we who now support it are mistaken, I will be the first to join in a movement for its abrogation.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the House at the last session there was much discussion as to the effect the entering upon the policy of reciprocity with Canada would have under "the most-favored nation clause" of our treaties with other countries. It was vehemently asserted at that time, and may be again reiterated, that those nations which have treaties with the United States containing what is known as "the most-favored nation clause" would have the right under such clause to demand admission for their products into the ports of the United States upon payment of the same duties granted to Canada. I have given some study and attention to this matter, and I find that the decisions are uniform in the Supreme Court to the effect that under such conditions the clause does not apply. The Customs Court handed down a decision within the last 10 days unanimously affirming this policy. This question is treated quite exhaustively in volume 5 of Moore's Digest of International Law, pages 257–288, and I will not take the time to read any of these decisions, but anyone interested can examine these references if he desires.

The effect of these decisions and holdings is to make it the policy of the United States to refuse to grant the rates of duty provided for under reciprocity to any other nation than the one with whom the treaty is made. "The most-favored-nation clause" does not apply, because the rule is "Identity of treatment under identity of circumstances and conditions," and the conditions and considerations which would prompt our Government to grant tariff concessions to one nation under reciprocity are not the same, and in the nature of things can not be the same, as would induce the granting of similar rates to other countries with whom we have "the most-favored-nation clause" treaty.

Thus far I have not discussed, except in the most general way, the schedules of the proposed agreement. I have not attempted to analyze the effect which the treaty may have upon any single industry. My belief is that under the policy of protection, as defined in our last national platform, the cost of production in Canada being substantially the same as in this country, a tariff duty upon any of the articles enumerated in the agreement above that provided is not demanded in the interest of protection, and therefore my hope and belief is that the agreement itself will not, when it becomes operative, be disastrous to any American industry.

If incidentally the enactment of this legislation shall prove that the definition of protection limiting it, as was done under the terms of the last national platform, is insufficient for the play of industrial forces and the development and maintenance of our industrial conditions on a plane of healthfulness and prosperity, then that in itself will be an experience worth the experiment which this agreement contemplates. The people of this country will never continue any policy which will hamper our means of production and development or in the slightest degree imperil our standard of living. The American Nation is irrevocably committed to the policy of protection. [Applause.] We on this side of the Chamber may differ, and honestly differ, as to the amount of duty that should be granted to an industry to enable that industry to maintain the American standard and to meet the competition of the same industry of another country of lower standard. There are no differences here as to the necessity of maintaining the principles of protection. While I do not desire to assume to be opinionated, I venture to assert that those adherents of very high tariff rates are not the best supporters and advocates of the protective policy. In other words, rates in excess of what is known to place the domestic producer on a par with his foreign competitor may furnish an incentive, especially under present trade and industrial conditions, to monopolistic tendencies which would unduly burden the domestic purchaser and consumer. The true protective policy at no point requires its advocates to demand or defend excessive or unnecessary duties. [Applause.] I am persuaded that the following from a recent speech of President Taft should be most carefully considered by all protectionists, when he said, in speaking of the agreement now under consideration:

> There are those conservative protectionists who hang back from an approval of this agreement on the ground that it is a departure from the principle of protection and is the opening wedge to let in free trade. My own view is that no step could be taken more in the interest of a reasonable policy of protection than the approval of this treaty. The very existence of the policy depends on our abolition of the tariff where it is not really needed under the principle of the last Republican platform. If we persist in retaining it in these times of high prices and gradually exhausting food supply and base our retention on protection principles, we shall rouse an opposition that will know no moderation and will not cease radical economic changes until it has removed from the statute book the last trace of a protective tariff.

[Applause.]

But it is contended with great earnestness by those who oppose this legislation, that it will prove disastrous to the farming interests of our country. An attack upon the farmers of this country, or even a failure to properly guard their interests, would prove disastrous, and rightfully so, to those responsible for such a movement. I represent a district and in part a State where the leading industry is that of agriculture. The various branches of agriculture in my State, coming as they do in direct competition with the lowest paid labor in the world, where the conditions and where the standard of living is among the lowest, I fully appreciate that the farming industries of my State could not exist for a season with such competition except for the imposition of an adequate tariff. I would be the last individual upon this floor to cast a vote, and my State would never tolerate a vote by any of its Representatives that would imperil or seriously affect the farmers of any portion of our country. [Applause.] I freely concede to every Representative upon this floor who may feel constrained to oppose this measure the utmost sincerity and honesty of purpose, and I only claim for myself the same honesty and sincerity which I freely concede to others. But after the best attention which I have been able to give to this subject in all its bearings I am unable to find that its enactment into law will imperil or appreciably affect the farming interests of the country, or of any particular section.

I appreciate the tremendous force which is included in any rallying cry made in behalf of the farmers of the country, but not being convinced that it is based upon truth and, furthermore, having a suspicion that there is possibly behind it something of selfish interests not allied with agriculture, I may be pardoned if I look with some degree of suspicion upon the forces and the motives of those who have inaugurated this protest. [Applause.]

There has been during the last few years a great prominence given to the subject of conservation. Tremendous interest has been created in the subject, and there is a widespread public sentiment that, with the enormous growth of our population and the consequent drawing upon our natural resources, the augmentation of these resources, and thereby to some extent prevent their exhaustion and impoverishment, is the part of wise statesmanship. Reciprocity with Canada must of necessity be chiefly confined to food and forest products, and the addition of these two great natural resources, bringing them within the reach of our fast-growing population, is a measure of conservation of greater importance than any that have yet been suggested.

Mr. Chairman, I have purposely refrained from discussing this legislation from the standpoint of any community or from the standpoint of any particular industry. This is an agreement between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America which requires concurrent legislative action by both countries in order that it may be made effective. Any change by amendment, however strongly I might favor certain changes, would of necessity throw the whole proceedings into negotiations again between the two countries, with the consequent delay and possible failure of any agreement at all. We are therefore compelled to either accept or reject the agreement. That is the practical question before this body. We have got to either vote it up or vote it down. Anyone pretending to be in favor of the agreement, but who is desirous of amending it, is in reality opposed to the agreement. Such an attitude will not deceive anyone acquainted with the real situation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as a protectionist and a Republican, I find no difficulty in bringing myself to the support of this great economic measure of the administration of President Taft. Long after the petty bickerings and jealous criticism of his administration shall have been forgotten the action of our President in bringing this measure before the Representatives of the American people will stand out as among the great accomplishments of an administration singularly conspicuous for the constructive measures which have become enacted into law. [Applause.] My judgment tells me that from the standpoint of the national welfare we should enact this legislation. I believe with President Taft when he said:

> Now is the accepted time. Now Canada is in the mood. She is at the parting of the ways. Shall she be an isolated country, as much separated from us as if she were across the ocean, or shall her people and our people profit by the proximity that our geography furnishes?

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN].

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, this measure has been very ably debated from every side excepting possibly one, and that is from the standpoint of a Member from the State of Pennsylvania and of a miner or producer of fuel. I rise only from a sense of duty to express to this body, the greatest representative body in the world, some sense of the obligation which the State of Pennsylvania and the district I represent owes to the Province of Canada. I represent the heart of the anthracite coal regions of the State of Pennsylvania. I live in the Wyoming Valley, the land celebrated by the poetry of Campbell, celebrated through the life and work of the Moravian missionaries among the Indians, celebrated as the birthplace of the greatest race of aborigines the world ever knew, and celebrated, I believe it will be, as the birthplace of the greatest race that this country will ever produce. We have there today as the basis of our population the English, the Irish, the Welsh, the German, and the Scotch. There has been introduced within the last decade new elements of the best laboring blood of Europe. We have the Piedmontes and others of the best from Italy, the Lithuanian, the Pole, and the Slovak, and I tell you as one who has had opportunities to observe, that they will make as good citizens as any that this country has heretofore produced.

The State of Pennsylvania sent into the Province of Canada in the year 1910 a large part of over $33,000,000 worth of fuel bought by that country. Over $14,000,000 of that amount was anthracite, upon which we did not pay a cent of duty. They also used over $17,000,000 worth of bituminous coal, and upward of $2,000,000 worth of coke, upon which the inhabitants of that country paid over $3,000,000 in duty for the sake of burning it. That country, gentlemen, can never become an industrial nation. Why? Because they have no adequate supply of fuel. What can we get from them? That country is fitted by nature to produce food to help feed our industrial population. Boundless natural resources fit this country, with their help, to support an industrial race beyond computation.

Less than $98,000,000 covers the total imports of Canada into this country. You will note they paid us for fuel alone over one-third that amount and over $182,000,000 more for other merchandise. Should we not have some feeling of gratitude toward them?

Continue to build the tariff wall that now exists between us higher and wider and before you are through with it you will only have openings through it from which cannon will point from each side to the other.

This is not a question of a tariff; it is a higher and broader question; it is a question of the universal advancement of the human race. I listened with a great deal of interest to what was said by the gentleman from New York City [Mr. GEORGE]. The population in my city is very much like it; they need sympathy and help. But I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, who called attention to the low wages paid in the State of Pennsylvania, that in the district that I come from we pay as good wages for labor performed as are paid in any place in the world.

We have serious accidents that excite the deepest feelings in man's nature. I once walked up to a shaft where a child was sitting and said to her, "What are you sitting here for, my child?" "I am waiting for my father." Her father had been buried in that mine through an accident that happened more than a week previous.

A fund was raised to relieve the necessities of those who were dependent upon the men who lost their lives in that disaster. I will say for the bankers of New York, however they may be traduced, we found their hearts open to the plea of distress. They, with the other good people of this country, established a fund which has been distributed in that mining district from that day to this, nearly 15 years.

In that connection I want to say that a lady from one of the principal cities of this Nation came to our city to ascertain what the conditions were, and whether it was necessary for her to do anything to ameliorate them. After visiting the whole community, she said to me, "There is more distress in one alley in my city than in your whole district." She visited homes that for months had not had a male protector to help them.

Gentlemen, I repeat, this is not a tariff question.

We are protectionists in my district. We believe in the protective tariff to the limit of competition, with a fair percentage to protect the manufacturer from surplus stocks. We claim that this is a protective measure, presented by one of the greatest Presidents this country ever produced—not the greatest politician, but a man with a broad judicial mind, deeply interested in the welfare of the people—and I submit that a fair majority, in my district ninety-nine one-hundredths of the Republicans and most of the Democrats, are with him.

Gentlemen, I shall vote for this measure [applause] because I do not believe it transgresses a single Republican principle, the principle of protection to American industries, and I do not believe it transgresses a single principle that protects the farmer in the best market for his product, the home market. Look over the reports of prices, the prices for to-day, of farm products in the United States, and there will be found as much difference in the various parts of this country as there is between those of this country and Canada. In the words of our Chaplain this morning, "Let our spiritual ears be unstopped and spiritual eyes be opened," that we may see in this measure one that is far above local conditions, one that tends to the advancement of the race, bringing together these two peoples who are one in lineage, one in their purpose—the elevation of the human race. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. "Reciprocity is only an international form of protection." This definition from the Standard Dictionary correctly describes reciprocity. It was this conception of reciprocity that caused the Republican Party to write in its platform:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for that which we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

This bill, introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], contains none of the elements of reciprocity. It provides not for protection but for free trade in the United States and protection in Canada. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A DEMOCRATIC MEASURE.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has said that this bill presents a political and not a partisan question. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] contends that it is both political and partisan, and that it is a Democratic measure, presented to this House in response to a resolution passed by a Democratic caucus, and that it is in full harmony with the declarations of the Democratic platforms.

I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and I, for one, am perfectly willing that the Democratic Party shall stand sponsor for this bill and shall be held responsible for its evil effects should it become a law.

The advocates of this bill content themselves with an academic discussion of reciprocity. They fail to point out wherein it is reciprocal and decline to analyze its provisions or the real effect which its enactment will have on the producer and consumer alike.

PROPOSED TRADE NOT RECIPROCAL.

By the provisions of this bill all the products of the Canadian farm are brought into competition with the product of the farms of the United States. It surrenders to the farmers of Canada the markets of the United States for all their produce. For the surrender of these markets it is proposed to reduce the duty on the farm implements manufactured and imported from Canada. This is practically the only reciprocity provided for in this bill.

Let us place in parallel columns, first, a list of the produce of the farm, and, second, a list of the farm and other machinery on which it is proposed to reduce the tariff, with the amount of such proposed reduction, and see if it is a fair and equal trade and if it is reciprocal. On the other side we have a list of practically everything grown on the farm, from which all tariff is removed and which is brought into direct competition with the cheaper farms and the cheaper farm labor of Canada. On the other side we have a list of manufactured articles upon which the duty is reduced and by which it is alleged the farmers of this country will profit all that they have lost through the placing of farm products on the free list:

FREE LIST.	REDUCED DUTIES OF FARM IMPLEMENTS.	Per cent ad valorem.
Cattle, horses, swine, sheep, mules, poultry, wheat, rye, oats, buckwheat, barley, dried peas, cowpeas, beans, corn, hay, straw, potatoes, sweet potatoes, yams, turnips, onions, cabbages, and all other vegetables; apples, peaches, pears, grapes, and berries; butter, cheese, milk, cream, eggs, honey, cottonseed, linseed, and other oil seeds, including clover and timothy seed, and other articles.	Farm wagons	2½
	Harrows	5
	Harvesters	2½
	Reapers	2½
	Seed drills	5
	Mowers	2½
	Horse rakes	5
	Cultivators	5
	Thrashing machine parts, baggers, weighers, etc	5
	Parts of thrashing machines, for repair	2½
	Portable and traction engines, no change.
	Horsepowers for farm use, no change.
	Hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, and hay tedders	5
	Motor vehicles, except for railways	5

Who can discover any real reciprocity in this trade? The injury it would work to the agricultural interests of this country is apparent. The benefits which we would receive are so small that they can not be discovered. No one has pointed them out.

CANADA'S DEMAND.

For more than a century the Dominion of Canada has knocked at our door for the free admission of her agricultural products, and at all times she has maintained the right to protect her manufacturers, as well as the manufacturers of Great Britain. She has desired free trade in agricultural products. At the same time she has demanded that her manufacturers be protected from importations by the American manufacturer.

Let us not, therefore, delude ourselves into believing that the reduction of from 2½ to 5 per cent in ad valorems on farm machinery will be of any benefit to the farmers of the United States. The Canadian farmer desires to enter into free competition to feed the 100,000,000 people of the United States and Canada, but the Canadian manufacturer is unwilling to enter into free and open competition with the American manufacturer in supplying the market of the two countries with manufactured articles. As long as Canada maintains her present position there can be no such thing as reciprocity between Canada and the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The simple fact is that it costs more to produce the products of the farm in the United States than it does in Canada. As shown by the report of the Tariff Board, farm labor and farm land is higher in the United States than it is in Canada. Under these conditions it can not truthfully be said that the cost of production is the same in the two countries.

LOWER PRICES TO FARMER NOT FOLLOWED BY LOWER PRICES TO CONSUMER.

It necessarily follows, therefore, that the price at which the farmer will be compelled to sell his produce will be affected by the enactment of this law. The extent to which the value of our farm products will be affected no one can say. But it does not follow that because the farmer will be obliged to accept lower prices for his produce that the ultimate consumer will be able to purchase his food supply any cheaper.

These positions are not inconsistent. By our complex method of production and distribution big interests profit by the loss to the original producer, and the price to the consumer is seldom affected. The best example of this is to be found in the removal of the duty on hides. I recall the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when he discussed the provisions of his bill. He contended that the duty on hides did not benefit the farmer, but, as he expressed it, only benefited the "big four," and that the removal of the duty on hides would not lessen the price of hides to the producer.

By the Payne tariff law hides were taken from the dutiable list and placed on the free list. On August 7, 1909, the Shoe and Leather Reporter gave the wholesale price of hides, No. 1 packers' native steers, at 17 cents per pound. On February 4, 1911, the same grade of hides was quoted by the same authority at 14 cents per pound. Everyone who is familiar with the subject knows that the farmer received 4 cents per pound less for his hides on February 4, 1911, than he received on August 7, 1909; but where is the buyer of shoes or of any other article manufactured from leather who could purchase such article cheaper on February 4, 1911, than he could on August 7, 1909?

HIGH COST OF LIVING—IS TARIFF RESPONSIBLE?

In the memorable campaign that ended on the 7th day of last November the principal issue was the high cost of living. The Democratic Party contended that the Payne tariff law was responsible for high prices. That election is far enough in the past and the next election is far enough in the future so that we ought to be able to consider the question of the high cost of living dispassionately and purely as a business proposition, separate and apart from factional strife and political clamor.

The argument presented by our Democratic friends in support of this measure is a most ingenious and conflicting one. It all depends upon the person making the argument. Many of the arguments are based on the theory that this bill will not reduce prices, while others bottom their arguments on the express proposition that cheap food products will flow from the agreement authorized by this bill. By this bill they would lower the cost of living.

HOW DEMOCRACY WON.

I desire, therefore, to consider the question of the effect that recent tariff legislation has had on prices. First let us inquire if the issue of the high cost of living was fairly and honestly presented in that election. What are the facts? A few days before election, in practically every congressional district of the North our Democratic friends distributed circulars entitled "High cost of living," in which was placed in parallel columns a two weeks' store bill for October, 1896, and October, 1910. Such a circular was used in the district I have the honor to represent in this House. But, mind you, this circular was distributed only in the cities and towns. Our Democratic friends were very careful to see that this circular should not fall into the hands of the farmer, for it was only the price of farm products that this circular assailed.

DEMOCRACY WOULD LOWER PRICES ONLY ON FARM PRODUCE.

If the statements contained in this circular were good argument to the wage earners on the subject of the high cost of living before the election, they ought to be good argument to the farmers after election. I shall, therefore, for the benefit of Democratic and Republican farmers alike, print this circular in the RECORD. It assails only the product of the farmer, and points to the year of 1896 as a year presenting ideal conditions and ideal prices. The circular is as follows:

VOTERS AND HOUSEHOLDERS, READ THE WITHIN CAREFULLY—HOW TO SAVE YOUR MONEY—TAKE INTO BOOTH WITH YOU WHEN YOU VOTE—VOTE FOR YOUR FAMILIES.

High cost of living facts—Read carefully—Ponder well—Vote right—Prices, 1896 and 1910.

The Republican Party has been in complete control of every department of the Government since 1896—President, Senate, and Congress. They have given you a government of trusts—Beef Trust, Sugar Trust, Flour Trust, Clothing Trust, and the "daddy" of them all, the Tariff Trust. See the result below:

St. Louis prices.

TWO WEEKS' STORE BILL.

OCTOBER, 1896.		OCTOBER, 1910.
2 pounds salt pork	$0.10	2 pounds salt pork	$0.40
5 pounds pork chops	.50	5 pounds pork chops	1.25
5 pounds pork ribs	.30	5 pounds pork ribs	.75
4 pounds smoked shoulder	.30	4 pounds smoked shoulder	.54
2 pounds sausage	.15	2 pounds sausage	.35
5 pounds lard	.35	5 pounds lard	.85
5 pounds corned beef	.25	5 pounds corned beef	.62½
4 pounds butter	.40	4 pounds butter	1.20
2 dozen eggs	.20	2 dozen eggs	.50
1 pound cheese	.13	1 pound cheese	.25
1 barrel flour	3.50	1 barrel flour	5.65
4 pounds chicken	.40	4 pounds chicken	.72
21 pounds sugar	1.00	21 pounds sugar	1.16
2 pounds steak	.20	2 pounds steak	.35
5 pounds roast beef	.50	5 pounds roast beef	1.00
	8.28		15.59½

Look at these two store bills. Vote to protect your pocketbook. Your table bill has doubled; have your wages doubled? You pay 100 per cent more for your clothing, blankets, and household goods; has your salary kept pace with the increased cost of living? Your rent is higher and your fuel is higher; how much higher is your weekly wage check? Don't you think you had better help put the trusts that have doubled the cost of living out of business? Congressman GOOD'S vote helped to make the bill $15.59½ instead of $8.28.

FARMERS NOT ENTHUSIASTIC OVER DEMOCRATIC PRICES OF 1896.

I hope the farmers will study this circular. When they come to read it, let them take the first item, "Two pounds of salt pork, 10 cents," and ask themselves how much they would be obliged to sell their hogs for, allowing for offal, packers', jobbers', and retailers' profits, in order that salt pork could be bought at 5 cents a pound retail. Let me appeal to them to apply the same test to every item in this circular and then ask themselves the question, without regard to political affiliation, if they are in favor of this Democratic demand that the price of farm products that prevailed in 1896 shall be restored and shall permanently prevail. [Applause on the Republican side.]

DID PAYNE TARIFF INCREASE PRICES?

But is the Payne tariff law responsible for the cost of these articles? How can it be honestly charged that it increased the cost? The Payne tariff bill did not increase the duty on a single article named in this circular. One of the articles named in the circular was placed on the free list. On 8 of the 15 articles the duty was reduced 25 per cent and on the 6 remaining articles the duty was unchanged. So we have presented here the very amusing claim of our Democratic friends that by placing 1 of the 15 articles on the free list, by reducing the duty on 8 25 per cent, and by allowing the duty on 6 to remain unchanged we have thereby increased the cost of these articles to the consumer. For lack of a better name, I can only call this kind of reasoning Democratic logic.

It is a familiar saying of our Democratic friends that "the tariff is a tax, and the consumer has to pay it," and as corollary to this proposition it is also claimed that the removal of the tariff on an article by that much does it reduce the price to the ultimate consumer.

Let us apply this rule to some of the notable reductions in the Payne tariff law and ascertain if there has been a corresponding reduction in the price to the ultimate consumer.

Of the articles enumerated in this circular, the duty on pork, lard, and beef was reduced 25 per cent, and yet the retail price of these articles for 1910 advanced, if the information set forth in this circular is correct.

The tariff on cabbage was reduced 33 per cent, and yet where is the householder who is able to buy cabbage more cheaply because of the reduction in the tariff? The tariff on bituminous coal was reduced 33⅓ per cent and on agricultural implements 25 per cent. There was a reduction of 55 per cent on harness and of 60 per cent on boots and shoes, yet the purchasers of these articles at retail saw no reduction in the price after the tariff was lowered.

The tariff on barbed wire was reduced 37 per cent; on nails, spikes, and tacks from 20 to 50 per cent; and on starch 33 per cent; but where is the person who purchased any of these articles at retail who experienced any of the benefits of lower prices, which our Democratic friends proclaim would flow from a reduction in tariff duties.

But our friends on the other side of the aisle will say that these reductions were too slight, and that in order to benefit the ultimate consumer by lower prices the reduction should have been greater. The answer to this argument is that we took the tariff all off of several things which, or the products of which, are in general use, and in those cases there has been no reduction in the price to the ultimate consumer.

We placed hides, posts, and petroleum and its products on the free list. What was the result? The farmer is compelled to take 4 cents per pound less for his hides, but who receives the benefit of the reduction? Certainly not the ultimate consumer. The ultimate consumer is not interested in the price of hides. He is interested in the retail price of boots and shoes or of harness or of some other manufactured product of leather. Notwithstanding the fact that we took all the tariff off of hides, to the detriment of the farmer, and took 60 per cent of the tariff off of shoes and 55 per cent off of harness, the ultimate consumer of boots and shoes and of harness is obliged to pay more for both of these articles to-day than he could buy them for before this reduction. Fence posts were placed on the free list, but the purchaser of fence posts at retail realizes no reduction in the price.

Petroleum and its products were placed on the free list, but the users of kerosene and gasoline oils are looking, and will continue to look, in vain for a corresponding reduction in the retail price of these articles because of this reduction in the tariff.

TRUSTS AND NOT CONSUMERS BENEFITED.

Should the agreement which this bill authorizes be entered into, the unorganized and unprotected farmers of the North will have strong competition and will be forced to sell their raw materials at reduced prices, but the ultimate consumer—the user of shoes, not hides or leather; the purchaser of oatmeal by the package, not oats by the bushel; the buyer of flour by the sack or bread by the loaf, and not wheat by the bushel; the user of starch and not the purchaser of corn in the shock or in the crib—will find that the Canadian farmer has a better market and a better price for his product. Yes; he will then learn that the American farmer is compelled to sell his product in a more restricted market and at a reduced price, but that he, the ultimate consumer, will be compelled to pay the same price for what he eats and for what he wears that he paid before the enactment of this law.

The result is that the farmer who raises and sells the raw product of the farm must take a lower price. The manufacturer and the jobber, who are organized and control the situation, secure a larger profit; the ultimate consumer pays the same or a higher price.

This is a condition to be deplored and to be corrected, but the tariff, except where it is excessive and on noncompetitive articles, is not responsible for it. Large manufacturers, importers, and distributers practically control the output of the necessities of life and dictate the price. Take coffee, for instance, which has been on the free list for years. Rio No. 7 on August 1, 1909, sold for 7¼ cents per pound at wholesale. On February 4, 1911, the wholesale price of the same grade of coffee was 12⅞ cents per pound. The cause of the advance in price in coffee can not be attributed to the tariff; nor can the increase of the price of the articles named in this misleading and unreliable circular.

HIGH PRICES WORLD-WIDE—WORLD-WIDE CAUSES.

If gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have any real desire to get to bottom of the question of the high prices, and the relation of the tariff to them, they will not proceed far with their investigation until they discover that the tariff, except in cases of excessive duties and duties on noncompetitive articles, has little, and in almost every case absolutely nothing, to do with the retail prices to the ultimate consumer. They will also find that supply and demand, overproduction and shortage in crops, cold storage and monopoly—these and other agencies control the entire question of the rise and fall of prices. They will find that these same causes obtain in free-trade England as well as in the United States.

The difficulty in considering the question of the tariff and its relation to prices is that we have considered it from a very narrow and restricted viewpoint. We have not considered the question of the prices of food from the standpoint of the markets of the world. We have not compared our market of food products with the market of like products in other countries. The only comparison that has been made compares the price of articles at a time when the country is prosperous with prices of like articles at a time when the country was locked in the paralysis of hard times, when everybody had labor or the product of labor to sell, and when but few had the money with which to buy. In 1896 prices were low, and there was no market for many of the products of the farm or the factory, even at bankrupt prices, and I hope and pray that those times and those prices shall never again come to this country. [Applause.] It means hardship and suffering.

WHAT AN AGE OF CHEAPNESS MEANS.

Is it an age of cheapness that is desired? I very much doubt it.

Where shall we begin in this crusade for cheaper things? Some one says cheaper rent—cheaper homes. The home is the foundation of our institutions, the bulwark of our Republic, and nothing is more to be coveted than homes at fair and reasonable prices. But what does this mean? Cheap rent and cheap homes mean cheaper labor in the stone quarry, cheaper labor in the limekiln and the cement factory. It means lower wages for the stonemason, the bricklayer, the carpenter, the lather, the plasterer, the plumber, the painter, and the laborer. Rent is high, but the labor that built the house is high, and all the material that went into it is high, and that material in turn was largely the product of labor.

We can not have high prices for labor and low prices for the product of labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Cheap homes mean cheap labor, and so it is with everything that we eat and everything that we wear—it is largely the product of labor. Cheap food and clothing mean cheap labor on the farm, in the factory, and in the shop. Laborers of this country, do you want it?

I do not want to be understood as approving all of the increases in the cost of the necessities of life, nor do I contend that labor has always had its just share of that which it, jointly with capital, has produced. It too frequently happens that the avarice and selfishness of men robs labor of its just share in the progress of its time. All too often men in their avarice exact too high prices for the necessities of life. It was always so; it always will be so. These inequalities and injustices are seen in every period of the world's history. They have existed, not by virtue of any law but in spite of statutory enactment. Much as these conditions are to be deplored, no political party and no government has yet discovered an easy or a complete remedy.

Our Democratic friends say that this is a proposition of give and take. I admit it. It takes protection from the farmer and gives it to the trusts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have compiled from Bulletin 77 and from the bimonthly bulletin of the Bureau of Labor a comparative table, showing the increase in prices of 11 principal products, and also the increase in wages in 11 principal occupations for the years 1899 to 1907. I shall append this table to my remarks, for it shows that the increase in the price of labor has kept pace in the cost of food products.

The increase in the prices of food is not confined to the United States, but is a world-wide movement. A comparison of the retail prices of the necessities of life in this country with prices of similar articles abroad will reveal the fact that the increase in prices abroad has been as rapid and almost, if not fully, as great as in this country.

In an editorial in the Independent the editor says:

> The fact that prices have risen the world over—in England, in Russia, in China, and South America, although not as much as here—proves a world-wide cause.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and one of the best posted men on the conditions of labor and the prices of the necessities of life in the world, says:

> Mentally contemplating the many cities I have visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe that I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely upon the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay in money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things of life in America.
> Living is cheap to the wage earner of Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desire for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a larger and freer life.
> How often do these people eat meat? is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among wage workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States.
> The immigrant coming to America finds that if he can buy in quantity (in cases where he need not) his flour, fuel, potatoes, oil, sugar, coffee, salt—the essentials for his plain table—all cost less than they ordinarily do in the land he left. The cheapness and abundance of many varieties of fruits and of our melons and tomatoes is a surprise to him. Closely after the most pressing necessities comes a line of things cheaper than in Europe—cotton clothing, including overalls, jumpers, shoes.
> The main conclusion as to housing is the same as that relating to food: If the immigrant to this country is willing to continue living here at the same level he is obliged to accept in his native land, he can find it for the same money.

WHAT DEMOCRACY PROPOSES.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], a member of the Ways and Means Committee which reported this bill, says: "This is a step, and only a step, in the right direction." The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has introduced another bill, which has been favorably reported to this House by the Ways and Means Committee, in pursuance to the action of the Democratic caucus. This bill is the next step which our Democratic friends propose to take to reduce the price of the products of the farm. Under the guise of putting farm machinery on the free list, when they know or ought to know that the American farmer would profit nothing by the enactment of such a law, for but few foreign-made implements are suitable for or would ever be used on the American farm, it places the American stock raiser in direct competition not only with the farmers of Canada, but with the farmers and stock raisers of the entire world. This farmers' free-list bill places beef, veal, mutton, pork, and all kinds of meat on the free list. If this free-list bill proposed by our Democratic friends shall become a law, the stock raisers of Iowa and the Middle West—and every farmer in that section is a stock raiser—will be forced to compete with the cheap land, cheap labor, and cheap live stock raised in Mexico, in Argentine Republic, and the other South American countries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WHY PROTECTION FOR SOUTHERN PRODUCTS ONLY?

This Democratic program is the most unreasonable and unfair proposition ever submitted to the Congress of the United States. If these two Democratic measures shall become laws, everything that is grown on the farms in the North will be on the free list, while everything that is grown on southern farms will be protected by tariff duties. Is this fair?

The Republican policy of protection provides for the "imposition of such duties as will equal the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries." It measures the protection that the farmers of the South shall enjoy with the same rule that it measures the protection granted to the farmers of the North.

And this is as it should be. If we are to have free trade in the farm products of the North with all the world, then let us have free trade with all the world in the farm products of the South. If we are to have free wheat, free flour, free corn, free hay, free oats, and free barley, why not have free oranges, free lemons, free bananas, and free citrus fruits? If free beef, free veal, and free meats of all kinds are so much to be desired, why not free sugar, free rice, and free tobacco?

Why should we grow free popcorn in the North and protected peanuts in the South? [Applause and laughter.] In a word, why free trade for the products of the farms of the North and high protection for the products of the farms of the South? Real reciprocity with Canada is a good thing for both countries, but reciprocity between the different sections of our own country is better.

PROTECTION JUSTIFIES WISDOM OF THE FATHERS.

The United States and Canada! What untold possibilities are embraced in these! Separated only by an imaginary line, the people of the United States and Canada, having a common ancestry, engaged in common pursuits, living under natural conditions in all respects similar, speaking a common language, having a common religion, have not enjoyed, either individually or nationally, the same degree of prosperity. Why?

The early settlements in these two countries were made about the same time. The area of the United States is less than that of Canada, yet under the policy of protection to American industries our country's growth has been unparalleled, and to-day we number 92,000,000 people. Under a policy of granting to the mother country preferential rates of duties, which stimulated manufacturers in Great Britain and gave but little or no encouragement to them at home, Canada's growth and development has been so stunted and retarded that to-day her total population numbers less than 7,500,000 people.

The annual yield of our farms aggregates over sixteen times more than does the farms of Canada. The value of our farm animals is eight times more than the value of the farm animals in Canada. The value of the manufactured products in the Dominion of Canada in 1905 was only $1,308,000,000, while in the same year, under the policy of protection, the products of our factories aggregated the stupendous sum of $14,802,000,000.

PROTECTION ASKS FOR NO APOLOGIST.

Mr. Chairman. I have no desire to defend the policy of protection. That policy needs no champion, no apologist, no defender. In the beginning the fathers laid deep and wide the foundations of protection. The first law signed by George Washington as President of the United States was a statute providing for protection to American industries, and from that day to this protection has been our beacon light, lighting the way to an industrial and commercial supremacy unapproached in all the history of the world. The record of our achievements under this policy is the industrial history of the Republic, portraying a progress unrivaled and unchecked, except when the policy of protection was abandoned. Under this policy ours has become a nation of individual prosperity, a land of opportunity, a country of such marvelous industrial and commercial achievement that it is the hope and inspiration of the world. Others may tamper with these foundations, but I, for one, shall vote to keep the faith. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as a Republican and an admirer of our great and good President I frankly confess that I enter upon the discussion of the measure before us with somewhat of embarrassment. But if as a Republican and a believer in reciprocity I have some embarrassment in opposing this bill, which has been labeled a reciprocity measure, how much greater must be the embarrassment of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, who but recently commissioned by the American people, as they understand it, to revise the tariff along Democratic lines—whatever that may be—find themselves confronted at the very threshold of their opportunity and responsibility with the necessity of accepting from a Republican President this measure which they present as the first fruits of their promises to the American people in the last campaign. If we recollect what they promised aright, it was that they were to remove the duty from certain trust-made goods, that they were going to reduce certain so-called "iniquitous schedules" of the Payne tariff bill, but lo and behold, this triumphant and vociferous majority, immediately upon being convened in special session, accept from a Republican President a measure prepared under his direction and present it without the opportunity of amending it by so much as a word, a line, or a syllable. It occurs to me that this must be a trying situation for the gentlemen on the other side.

I have no criticism to make of anyone connected with the executive departments of the Government with regard to the negotiation of the agreement, the fruit of which is presented in the measure before us. The President in his message to Congress presenting the agreement gave to us the reasons which actuated him, and referred to the conditions and circumstances which in his opinion warranted an effort on his part to make a trade agreement with Canada which he hoped, of course, would be advantageous to the people of both countries. The President having secured the best agreement he could under the circumstances—and how far that agreement before us differs from the hopes and expectations with which the negotiations were undertaken we can not say—it became his duty to transmit the finished product to Congress for its consideration.

RESPONSIBILITY RESTS WITH CONGRESS.

He did his duty, he accepted his responsibility. The measure is before us, the responsibility is now ours. We have now our duty to perform, and it occurs to me that what we shall do with regard to this measure depends very largely upon what we view to be our duty and responsibility under the circumstances. This being the case, I would like to propound this query to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber.

Had this measure come as an original product of the labors of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, had they initiated the legislation and presented it to us without opportunity to amend, how many votes would there have been on this side of the Chamber for the measure when the vote came upon its passage? In my opinion, very few. On the other hand, is there anyone who in the wildest flight of fancy can picture a condition under which the Democratic majority, elected on the promises that temporarily swept them into power, would upon their own motion and their own volition have presented to the House this measure in its present form? Had anything of that kind occurred, had this been the handiwork and product of a Democratic Ways and Means Committee of the House, and presented without the opportunity of amendment, how many votes would there have been for it on that side of the Chamber? And, gentlemen, our duty and responsibility is in nowise lessened or affected by the fact that this "pact," as it is called on the other side—and it is "packed" with disaster to American industries, from start to finish—that this pact did not originate in the House of Representatives, where under the Constitution it should and by the law it must originate, but originated elsewhere. Our duty remains the same as though it had originated in a constitutional way and been presented in the ordinary course of business. Whatever others may think about it, Mr. Chairman, I shall deem it my duty, touching this measure, to vote against it, as I would have voted against it had it originated in a committee of this body.

NOT TRUE RECIPROCITY.

This is called a reciprocity agreement; but who ever heard of a reciprocity agreement in competing articles? That is a curious and jaundiced view of reciprocity which says to the farmers along 3,000 miles of our border, "You must surrender your magnificent markets to your only formidable competitor, because, forsooth, the Canadian Government proposes to lower the duty on coal for the benefit of its own people in central Canada." What sort of reciprocity is that which assumes that the stockmen throughout the length and breadth of the land shall be pleased with the arrangement because, while their industry is to suffer from the competition of all of the surplus of Canadian live stock, at the same time and in the same pact the Canadian Government is endeavoring to give its people cheaper cottonseed oil and early tomatoes? There is no reciprocity in the measure from a Republican standpoint, but rather the surrender of the markets of our farmers and stockmen in the hope of helping not them but other classes of our citizens.

AS TO "SPECIAL INTERESTS."

Few arguments have been made for the measure, that I have heard; but in lieu of arguments there has been a lot of declamation, and some gentlemen have suggested that we should support the measure because certain "special interests" are said to be against it.

The only "special interest" I have heard from that is against the measure unanimously and everywhere is the special interest upon which rest the foundations of this Republic, the special interest which is the bone and the sinew, the hope and the defense of the Union—the farmers and the stockmen of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But while we are talking about "special interests," let us not forget that there are powerful special interests moving heaven and earth in its support. For instance, there is the special interest that speaks every day with a million tongues that is for the pact because of the hope that it will give them, the great newspapers, temporarily at least, cheaper print paper, though it may destroy American industries employing tens of thousands of American workingmen. Great railroad systems on both sides of the international boundary are for it because it will increase their business. Great coal interests in Pennsylvania and West Virginia are for it because they indulge the fond hope that of the 8 cents reduction in the Canadian coal duty they will get a small crumb; I hope they, at least, will not be disappointed, for they are the only American citizens who can ever get any benefits under this bill without injury to their fellow citizens. The great milling interests are for it because they believe it will help their business.

WORSE THAN IT APPEARS.

The agreement is bad enough on its face in all conscience—the surrender of five millions of duty upon the remission by Canada of half that sum; the surrender of the splendid market of 92,000,000 people in the hope of obtaining the uncertain market of 7,500,000 people, 65 per cent of which we already have in spite of the preferential tariffs in favor of other countries. But these facts, writ in letters so plain that he who runs may read and the wayfaring man, though a fool, may not err therein, tell only half of the story. The fact is that for those products to which we give free entry into our ports we furnish an absolutely unlimited market, while as to those products for which Canada gives us free trade or a lower duty we either have the market now or conditions are such that it is utterly impossible for us to increase our trade there.

Does anyone doubt who understands the great grain and milling business of the country that with this agreement in force all the surplus of Canadian wheat will come through our ports, and that, great exporting nation that we are, we will purchase all those grains and give them the benefit of our splendid channels of export, and that the same thing will occur with regard to live stock? As for print paper we will furnish an unlimited market. And what do we get in return? A reduction of the duty on cottonseed oil, a slight reduction of the duty on coal, reductions that by no possibility can be of any advantage to American citizens or extend American trade.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

But the gentlemen have said that we must not mind that, that this pact or agreement was entered into for the purpose and with the expectation of reducing the high cost of living, and that it will have a wonderful effect in that direction.

A month ago it might have been worth while to have spent some time arguing against that proposition, but it is scarcely necessary now, for the proponents of the measure have themselves been spending all the time they have spent in argument in trying to prove that they did not mean what they originally said and to assure us that by no possibility can the tearing down of the tariff wall as against Canadian products reduce the price of American farm produce. Ah, the trouble is the gentlemen started in originally to prove too much, and now they are endeavoring to prove too much in the other direction. The fact is that this agreement will not furnish the ultimate consumer any product of the farm, the mine, or the forest cheaper than he is now obtaining it, but will largely reduce the income of the American producer in those lines.

Everyone who knows anything about the farming business knows that a difference of 10, 15, or 20 cents a bushel in the price of a farmer's wheat means the difference between a fair profit and absolute loss. We all know that the difference of a dollar or $2 a head in cattle or of 50 cents or a dollar a head for sheep means to the stockman the difference between success and disaster. And yet who is there who believes that such reductions would ever reach the table of the ultimate consumer or benefit those who consume the products?

Wheat must pass through the hands of the miller, the jobber, the retailer, and to the baker, and the difference in price, which to the Dakota farmer spells ruin, will never be discovered in the price of the loaf of bread upon the table of the consumer. Cattle and sheep must go to the packing house and pay heavy freight charges on the way, pass on to the jobbers, to the butchers, and finally come to the table of the consumer; and a reduction in price, which to the stock growers in my country means disaster, will never be noted in the price which the consumer pays for the product in the butcher shops of the country.

ENCOURAGING CANADIAN DEVELOPMENT.

There is an objection to this agreement which appeals very strongly to the people of the intermountain States who are desirous of seeing their country settled and developed. For a number of years past there has been a strong tide of immigration from the United States into the Canadian northwest; mostly of substantial farmers and business men of some means, the very classes we need the most for the settlement and development of our region. These people have been passing through our territory by the thousands, lured to Canada by extensive advertising, setting forth the liberality of Canadian land laws compared with ours and therefore the better opportunity of securing a home and a farm cheaply. This agreement, providing, as it does, that the immigrant to the Canadian northwest shall enjoy additional advantages by having free access to our markets for his produce and his live stock, will tend to further encourage and increase the settlement of Canada by American farmers, thus retarding and delaying the settlement and development of our Intermountain States.

I take off my hat to the gentlemen who, on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, negotiated this treaty. [Applause on the Republican side.] No longer may the Yankee pride himself on being the great trader of the world. I commend to him our Canadian cousin. Those gentlemen knew the trade and industries of their country, and they drew an agreement every line of which gave them the advantage of the wonderful markets of the most wonderful country on earth in exchange for seeming advantages in the markets of a land where, in spite of all preferential tariffs against us, we now practically control all the markets worth while.

INTERESTING DETAILS.

Here is an illustration of one of the minor matters not overlooked in this pact. Up on our northern boundary, west of Lake Superior, is a great railway line, and the heroic builder of that great overland system is an exceedingly earnest supporter of this measure. That railroad is, I believe, the largest single importer of coal from Canada into the United States. Under the Dingley bill the duty on lump or run-of-mine bituminous coal was 62 cents and on slack or fine coal 15 cents per ton.

It so happened that by certain Treasury decisions the importer of coal came to receive the slack rate upon an estimate of all the fine coal in every shipment, with the result that the importer was only paying the higher rate upon about two-thirds of our importations.

This, of course, was a fraud on the Treasury, for commercially slack is the fine dust, cuttings, and broken coal produced in the process of mining and screening. It is sold at a low price. Oftentimes there is no market for it, but at any rate it is always cheap compared with commercial grades of coal selling at from one-fifth to one-third of the price; therefore this being a cheap product is entitled to a comparatively low rate. Under the Treasury ruling referred to, however, the importer received the slack rate on as great an amount of every shipment of the higher priced coal as he could badger the customs officials into accepting as being fine enough to pass through a half-inch screen. In order to put an end to this practice a provision was placed in the Payne bill in which the rate on coal was reduced to 45 cents per ton and the slack rate remained at 15 cents, to the effect that the slack rate should only apply to slack produced at the mine and shipped as such; and behold, the percentage of slack in our importations decreased from about one-third to about one-sixth or less of the total importations, though the same proportion of actual slack was imported as before. In this agreement we find a provision which, while it does not change the slack rate, does restore the language of the Dingley bill.

The railroad to which I refer imports, I think, about three-quarters of a million tons of coal a year, and if under this change of phraseology we shall go back to the old practice under the same language, I estimate that the difference in duty paid will amount to a very neat sum of money per annum, possibly somewhere between $60,000 and $75,000 on the importations of that one railway.

This is only one of the details which indicate that while no one here seems to have known anything about the details of this agreement during the time that it was under consideration, yet some interested people must have known much about it during the days of its negotiation.

REVIVAL OF DOCTRINE OF MACHIAVELLI.

Mr. Chairman, if I had time I should like to go into the agreement in some considerable detail, but my time is brief, and I want to close by referring to the fact that the consideration of this measure has developed a very remarkable philosophy, a philosophy pronounced and promulgated some centuries ago in Florence, but against which the good sense and the fairness of the world rebelled, a philosophy at this late date resurrected and reincarnated, apparently to serve the purposes of a temporary majority on the other side of the aisle. This philosophy has been stated in varying terms by several gentlemen on the other side, among them the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP]. But the gentleman who most clearly stated it to the House was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] in his speech to the House when this measure was formerly under consideration. Before I refer to what he said, I want to refresh your memory with the fact that it has been admitted by speakers who are defending the measure on both sides of the Chamber that it is unfair, unjust, inequitable, and full of inequalities, but nevertheless ought to be passed. This is the contribution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

> Again, while many features of the agreement reached by the parties will work injury, at least temporary, and possibly injustice to some particular sections of each country, if the common good of the entire people of either country is subserved by the agreement as a whole, it is the part of statesmanship for the Government of the country so affected to disregard the local or sectional disadvantages and injuries and consider only the total net result of the contract.
> THE COMMON GOOD.

When did it happen, gentlemen, that the common good was ought else but the sum of individual and local well-being? When did it occur that common good could be founded upon inequality, upon injustice, upon the destruction of industry? When was it considered good governmental policy to sacrifice a part of the people for the benefit of others? Not since the days of Machiavelli, whose name has become synonymous with that discredited philosophy which would sacrifice a large portion of the people in the hope of benefiting others. According to this philosophy, American citizens, American industries, American communities are to be considered as pawns upon the chessboard, to be sacrificed without mercy and without consideration if by their sacrifice some temporary gain shall be had in a desperate political game. From this doctrine of Machiavelli, from this doctrine of selfishness and injustice I appeal to the Republican doctrine of true reciprocity and protection for all citizens and all industries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, under Republican reciprocity the people of both countries, of both peoples to the agreement, are benefited, and no one is injured. Under Republican reciprocity and protection the benefits extend to every citizen and every industry. We seek the common good, not through injustice and discrimination, but through benefits conferred upon all alike, by surrounding this great Nation with its high standard of living, with its high-wage scale, with its splendid opportunities, on all sides by the tariff wall of protection, without which you can not keep out the inundating tides of the products of pauper labor and peon conditions and maintain American standards and promote American ideals. From the new doctrine of the temporary majority on that side—that it is proper and right to sacrifice American communities here and there, in the vain hope that other American communities may prosper thereby—I appeal to the beneficent policy that for the last 50 years, under the leadership of the Republican Party, has built up, established, and maintained here the most universally prosperous conditions ever known among men. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I belong to that verdant class known as the new Members. I recognize the courtesies and precedents of this floor, which dictate that new Members should be seen and not heard, and I came here with a chastened resolve to respect that custom; but the course of this debate has simply made it impossible for me to keep still, and this is my only explanation or apology for fracturing a custom or breaking my own chaste and strong resolves.

I come from a section of the country where agriculture is its principal source of wealth. While we are not all farmers in Iowa, we all realize that it is impossible to injure the agricultural interests without affecting every department of business.

This fact makes this situation embarrassing to me. I am a firm believer in Canadian reciprocity, and for years have been a humble advocate of it on the prairies of Iowa. I advocated it, however, because I believed that it would be of benefit to the agricultural interests of my State; that it would have a tendency at least to break the power of some large organizations that had monopolized the American market, and were exacting unreasonable prices from the farmer. I never advocated it for the purpose or with the hope that it would reduce the price of agricultural products.

I am now puzzled with the dilemma of supporting or opposing a measure that represents the principles I have advocated, but so applied as to produce exactly opposite results from what I had intended should be accomplished by it.

Instead of putting upon the free list the articles of monopolistic manufacture in this country, this bill safely protects and guards them, while the agricultural products alone are made to feel the withering effect of free competition with the cheap, fertile fields of Canada. The advocates of this bill now have the affrontery to tell us that because we have been advocating reciprocity we are now getting just what we asked for. They seem to overlook the fact that we asked for bread and they have given us a stone, or, at least, a lemon.

They pass the bottle with the good old label on it, but the real thing has been removed and the bottle has been refilled with a bitter concoction, and when some are disposed to make faces and grimaces they simply point with an assuring smile to the good old label.

Now, even in Iowa, prohibition Iowa, I am not quite certain that all of her people would be satisfied with a mere label, and I am suspicious that the constituents of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Kentucky would not be satisfied with mere labels, however assuring or inspiring. We are not satisfied with a bottle labeled "reciprocity," we want some of the real thing in it.

My objection to the Payne tariff bill was not so much that the duties were too high, but that they were adjusted in such a manner as to be unfair; unfair, if you please, to the great agricultural Middle West, of which my State is a part.

I never could see any justification in putting hides upon the free list while retaining the products manufactured from them upon the protected list.

The farmers of my section of the country, however, were consoled by the assurance that if they allowed the tariff to be taken from hides that they would be recompensed for their loss by an equal or greater reduction in the price of boots, shoes, and other leather products which they bought.

The agricultural West has certainly waked up and found that they were handed a lemon in that matter. While hides have steadily gone down, boots, shoes, and all other leather products have speedily gone up. While being compelled to sell their own products for less, they are compelled to pay more for what they buy. They have been hit both coming and going.

Now, gentlemen, that is unfair. I find lurking in this proposed reciprocity agreement the same element of unfairness. In fact, it is accentuated. The Payne bill only puts hides on the free list. This measure, now fathered by the majority, puts not only hides, but hoofs, horns, and tail, and all between on the free list, and still leaves boots and shoes on the protected list. Can anyone tell me why wheat should be on the free list and flour on the protected list? Are not the millers of this country, with their large capital, extended experience, splendid mills, and latest improved machinery as able to compete with the millers of Canada in the manufacture of flour as are the farmers of the United States able to compete with the farmers of Canada? If not, why not?

The tenets of my party prescribe that we shall have a tariff sufficiently high to equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. Every man, I believe, who has spoken upon this subject in this Congress or the last, has admitted that the cost of production of wheat is less in Canada than in the United States. Why is not wheat, under the tenets of our party, entitled to that much protection? Practically every man who has spoken upon the subject, either at this session of Congress or the last, has admitted that articles could be manufactured in this country, on the whole, as cheaply as they could in Canada. If this is true, the tenets of our party, honestly applied, would remove protection from manufactured articles rather than from agricultural products.

The advocates of this measure make this strong argument in its defense on the ground that it will bring cheaper food to the laboring man. If that is the real object, why should there be protection upon flour? The laboring men of this country eat flour, not wheat. [Applause.]

It is plain that there is a combination between the large milling interests of this country to maintain prices on flour. If that is true, what advantage can the consumer of flour receive by an agreement that allows wheat to be bought by the miller cheaper but protects him from competition? The miller can still hold his price just as high as he did before.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman vote with us for free flour?

Mr. PROUTY. With Canada?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; and with the balance of the world.

Mr. PROUTY. No, sir.

Again, if the stock raisers of this country are compelled to raise cattle and sell them in competition with those raised in Canada, why should not the American packer be compelled to sell meat products in competition with the Canadian packer? Is it possible that the American packer can not compete with the Canadian packer, if he gets cattle at the same price?

What are the conditions which make it necessary to protect the packer and leave the stock raiser open to the effects of competition?

It is not an idle guess that the great packers of this country are in a conspiracy to maintain prices and throttle competition in this country. They are under indictment for that very act, and the only defense that they have so far offered is that they have been at it so long that it is now barred by the statute of limitation, and that the Government knew it so well that it is now entrapped. [Laughter.] Is the Government under obligations, while prosecuting them for conspiracy, to maintain prices to shield them from foreign competition so that they may be able to hold up prices? Our recently elected United States Senator from Iowa is going to stop at Chicago on his way from Des Moines to Washington long enough to put some of those fellows in the penitentiary. [Laughter.] What good will that do the consumer if the monopoly is still protected?

I would like for some one to show us how it will make cheaper beef to the consumer if the packers have a monopoly. If they have a monopoly, as soon as cattle come into their possession, whether from Canada or the United States, they are subject to the same conditions, and they can, they have, and they will fix the price to the consumer with very little regard to the original cost of cattle.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I would like to yield to the gentleman from Texas, but I can not spare the time.

If the United States is going to secure cheaper meat products to the laboring men of this country, they must devise a system that will maintain competition not only at the point of production, but clear up to the point of consumption. If they want to help the laboring man, they must keep in mind that laboring men eat beef, not cattle; they eat pork, not hogs; they eat mutton, not sheep. [Laughter and applause on Republican side.] Why, then, put upon the free list the things they do not use and leave protected the things they do?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. HARDY. I want to answer the gentleman.

Mr. PROUTY. No; not answer. That should be in the gentleman's own time, not mine.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that we do not think it necessary to give a duty on meat; that we favor free meat, too.

Mr. PROUTY. Why, then, do you not put it in the measure that you propose to railroad through with the gentle assistance of the steam roller?

Mr. HARDY. Because we know that some of you on that side want to kill the treaty by adding something that will not go through. That is, it will that way be held in the Senate. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PROUTY. Again, if by this reciprocity treaty it was intended to furnish cheaper lumber to the farmer as an offset for those losses that he sustains, it, in a large measure, fails in its purpose. While it puts rough lumber on the free list, it leaves all kinds of manufactured lumber still on the protected list. Everyone familiar with the consumption of lumber in this country knows that by far the greater per cent of it is used in manufactured form; that is, it is planed on one side or both; on one edge or both edges; grooved, flanged, or otherwise prepared. This necessarily must be done by the mills. The rough lumber will therefore be bought by the mills in Canada, and before distribution in the United States, as is claimed, the lumber of Canada will be subject to the same conditions as the American product is now. While it will enable the mills to secure cheaper rough lumber, I fail to see how it will assist very materially in enabling the ultimate consumer to receive cheaper dressed or otherwise manufactured lumber. Take the duty off all kinds of lumber, and then you will enable the farmer to get cheaper lumber, because it will enable the Canadian mills to ship their product direct to the farmyard in the United States, and thus avoid the combination of the American lumbermen.

It is claimed that the manufacture and sale of agricultural implements in this country is monopolized; that one concern controls the trade. Can anyone tell me why the Government is under obligations to protect their product from competition while leaving exposed to competition the man who uses them? Can anyone give me a rational reason why the man who makes the plow should be protected more than the man behind the plow?

The Government has recently indicted and is pressing for trial the members of the Bathtub Trust.

This is a trust that controls plumbers' supplies in the United States. What justification can there be for the Government to prosecute these people for combination to maintain prices and at the same time afford them protection from competition so that they may maintain prices? I venture the assertion that the removal of the duty on plumbing material would do more in a nighttime to destroy that trust than all the grand juries and district attorneys could do in 10 years.

The reason I am not satisfied with section 3 in the bill proposed by the majority is because it is indefinite. It does not declare for any policy. It simply authorizes and requests the President to continue negotiations, without marking out any course along which these negotiations should proceed. I believe it is not only within the province but it is the duty of Congress, as the representatives of the people, to declare for a national policy.

If it is the judgment of this Congress that the President of the United States should continue negotiations for the purpose of putting upon the free list pumpkins, turnips, and popcorn—which seem by accident to have been omitted from the free list—let us do so; but if, on the other hand, we believe these negotiations should be continued with the view to putting on the free list some articles which would, in a measure, compensate the agricultural interests of this country, let us have the courage to do so.

In the substitute I shall offer for section 3 I have described with detail the articles that I believe should be put upon the free list, if it is intended to secure compensating benefits to the agricultural interests of this country. If the amendment I offer shall carry, I believe it will compensate the farmers of my section of the country sufficiently to warrant me in supporting the measure; but if it is not so amended, I shall be constrained to vote against it.

I can easily understand and comprehend the situation on that side of the House [pointing to the Democratic side]. Its majority and leadership come from a section of the country whose staple products will not be affected materially by this measure. They can not raise cotton, cane, rice, or peanuts in Canada. But I apprehend that if there was a large and fertile tract of land skirting the Southern States where these commodities would grow better and could be raised cheaper than in their own territory, and it was proposed to tear down the tariff wall, we would be permitted to witness girations and contortions on that side of the House [pointing to the Democratic side] that we will not be permitted to see to-day.

In the high and patriotic ideals of Democracy there still seems to be room for the homely rule "that it makes a difference whose ox is gored." But I wish to remind the gentlemen from the South of the eternal truth that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If we of the North are to furnish free popcorn for the boys of the South, you gentlemen of the South should furnish free peanuts to our girls of the North.

There are some men on this side of the House [pointing to the Republican side] who are opposed to this measure for exactly the opposite reason that I am. They fear that it will establish a precedent that will lead to the including of manufactured articles as well as agricultural articles in the free list with Canada. I am frank to say to you that if I were sure that it would lead to that result I would favor it.

I might be able to say to my agricultural friends in Iowa that while they had lost in the price of the product they had for sale they were perhaps reaping a substantially equal benefit from the reduced price of the things they had to buy.

The agricultural districts of the United States are simply asking for justice, not favors. They simply insist that that which they sell and that which they buy must be either on the free list or on the protected list. Now, that is fair.

The agricultural interests of this country have been held to the cause of protection from the time of the institution of the system by the argument that it was to the advantage of the farmer to build up a home market; that is, to bring the factory alongside the farm. With full belief in that theory, and with full faith in their Government that when they had once built up that market they would be allowed to preserve it for themselves, the agricultural interests of this country have for more than half a century borne the burden of protecting American manufactures, and I can not help but feel that it is grossly unfair to this industry to take away this market, that their own sacrifice has built up, and open it up to the foreigners, who never contributed a dollar for its upbuilding, and just at a time when the conditions of national production and trade makes this market of special advantage and interest to the American farmer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentlemen who are now offering this bill seem to admit its unfairness to the American farmer, for they announce that they have another bill putting upon the free list most or all the items of which I have made complaint. Now, these gentlemen know that while that measure may possibly pass the House it can not pass in its present form the Senate, and if perchance it should pass both Houses of Congress it can not pass the veto of the President. And this Congress will adjourn with farm products on the free list and everything the farmers buy still on the protected list. The gentlemen in charge of these measures know that. But they only smile, and think it a good joke on the Republicans. It may be a good joke on the Republicans, but it is a hard one on the farmer.

While there are many things in that bill for which I should be glad to vote, there are some things in it that will prevent its receiving my approval. I might be willing, as a reciprocal arrangement, to have the American farmer put in competition with the Canadian farmer, but I am not yet willing to allow the American farmer to come into competition with the world.

This bill, which they have designated as the "farmers' free-list" bill, puts upon the free list beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all kinds of meat. This would throw the American farmer into direct competition, not merely with Canada, but with Mexico, Argentine Republic, and the other countries to the south of us, where everybody knows cattle can be raised for less than one-half what they can in this country. If you will take the tariff off the beef and mutton from the Argentine Republic, it will drive the product of Iowa, Illinois, and Nebraska from the markets of all the eastern cities. Right now mutton in refrigeration is being shipped from Argentina into the New York markets, and after paying a duty of a dollar and a half per hundred is still able to compete with the American product. How long would it take to drive out the American mutton if the tariff was removed?

The reason I favor putting these matters in the reciprocity agreement is that we could not include it in the general tariff law and make it applicable to Canada alone. This would be a violation of what is known as the "favored nations" clause in our treaties with the principal nations of the world. It could be put into a reciprocal agreement with Canada without opening up the markets of the South. American farmers could probably stand the competition from the north, but they are not able to stand the competition of the south, and for that reason I am not able to give my support.

The reason I do not like this treaty is that it is unfair to the agricultural industry of this country. It puts upon the free list practically everything that the farmer produces and puts scarcely nothing on the free list that he consumes. Now, this is unfair. Very many able men have, however, said upon this floor that this reciprocity agreement would not materially injure the farmers; that it would not reduce the price of their commodities. That may be true, but I am afraid of it. To say the least, it is experimental, and it seems to me that it is time some of these experiments should be tried on some other department of industry.

This whole situation reminds me of a condition that existed in a certain family in the neighborhood of my early childhood. There was a wealthy and aristocratic family that had an unfortunate, demented girl. Her name was Sally. Everybody called her "Silly Sally." The family used her as a kind of an experimental station. When they had a mess of greens, and were not quite certain whether they were mustard or poison weed, they first tried them on Sally. If they had a mess of parsnips and were not quite certain whether they were tame or wild, they first tried them on Sally. If they had edibles from the timber and were a little bit in doubt as to whether they were toadstools or mushrooms, they tried them on Sally, and if they did not kill her, then the rest of the family partook. Poor Sally, even in her demented condition, finally comprehended the purposes for which she was being used, and one day in her desperation kicked over a pan of real mushrooms.

Now, I want to serve a notice—a mild and possibly verdant notice—upon the Members of both sides of this House, that the American farmer is getting rather tired of playing the rôle of "Silly Sally," and is now demanding that these experiments, or some of them at least, be tried on other members of the family. [Long laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides for the approval of the so-called Canadian reciprocity treaty. If this bill becomes a law and the Canadian Parliament enacts corresponding legislation, the agricultural products of Canada will be admitted into the United States free of duty, our farmers will be placed in direct competition with the farmers of Canada, and agriculture, the most important industry in the United States, will be robbed of any direct benefit from our protective-tariff policy.

This measure comes to us with the indorsement of a Republican President. I entertain the highest regard for our present Chief Executive, the Hon. William Howard Taft. I have confidence in his judgment, respect for his opinion, admiration for his ability, faith in his sincerity of purpose, and recognize that in negotiating this trade agreement and in urging its approval he has been actuated by the purest of motives, with no other object in view than to render to his country and countrymen the highest service possible. I regret exceedingly that in this matter I can not follow his leadership.

Free trade in farm products with Canada will result in irreparable loss to the farmers of the United States. Agriculture is the foundation of our wealth, the bedrock on which rests our industrial fabric, the pillar that upholds our free institutions, and the mainstay of our national strength and greatness.

Depression in agriculture means paralysis in trade transportation, mining, and manufacturing. Prosperity to the 10,000,000 persons employed on our 6,000,000 farms means prosperity to all—prosperity to the 5,000,000 persons employed in trade, commerce, and transportation; prosperity to the 7,000,000 persons employed in mechanical pursuits and manufacturing establishments; prosperity to the 1,000,000 employed in our mines; prosperity to the 5,000,000 persons employed in personal and unclassified service; and prosperity to the one and a quarter million of persons employed in professional pursuits.

Any legislation, any national policy that lays the hand of adversity upon the farmers of our country, will start in motion a great tidal wave of disaster, that will go on and on, increasing in force, until it envelops every industry and business in the land.

Canadian reciprocity as exemplified by the proposed legislation has not been in recent times an issue before the American people. It was not an issue in the campaign of 1908. It was not an issue in the campaign of 1910. No national convention of any political party has made a declaration thereon. Senators and Representatives in this Congress, as a rule, were not elected on this issue. We have not discussed this question before our constituents. It is a new question. The facts have not been presented to the people. The farmers and others who feel that this measure would affect them injuriously have had no opportunity to be heard. No intelligent, trustworthy public sentiment has been formed on the subject. In great questions like this, affecting vitally the national interests of the people, Congress should follow public opinion. It is our duty to crystallize public sentiment into law. As Representatives in Congress there is no safer guide for us than the will of the people. In this matter no man can say he is following public sentiment, for no real public sentiment has been formed. Without an intelligent public sentiment to guide us, without opportunity to fairly discuss this question before the American people, the advocates of this measure propose to enact legislation that will be more far-reaching in its influence upon the business interests of this country than any other law that has been passed since the close of the great Civil War.

There is no emergency calling for immediate action. Our country is facing no crisis. No great national peril confronts us. We are at peace with the people of Canada and with all the rest of the world. Times are good. Our workmen are employed at good wages. Internal commerce is flourishing. Our railways are busy. Our industries are active. The country is prosperous. Under these conditions it is unwise to hastily enter upon a long voyage of doubt and uncertainty, knowing not whether we shall land in a harbor of peace and safety or go down in a wreck that will be the result of our own folly and madness.

FARMERS' WORK IN BUILDING NEW STATE.

I have no apology to offer for standing here in defense of my farmer constituents. I was born and reared on a farm. I know something of the difficulties with which the farmer contends. I know from personal experience the hardships he must endure, and the struggle he must make to maintain himself and family.

Twenty-two years ago to-day I stood on the border, near the line between Kansas and Oklahoma. I was waiting for the gun to be fired at 12 o'clock noon, April 22, 1889, giving the signal for the start in the first great race for homes in the new promised land of Oklahoma. With that great rush I went into the new Territory and have resided there continuously ever since. In this 22 years I have been intimately associated with the farmers of that country. I know the sacrifices our homesteaders have made in the founding and building of the new State of Oklahoma. I know that it has been through the industry, the toil, the sacrifices, the persistence, the pluck, energy, and intelligence of our farmers that Oklahoma has attained such eminence in wealth and population and has made such a splendid record in the building of homes, churches, and schools, and in the founding of social and political institutions.

CONSTITUENTS IN CITIES.

All my constituents are not farmers. Oklahoma City, within my congressional district, contains 70,000 or 80,000 population. I have many smaller cities. I owe to my constituents residing in the towns and cities the same consideration that I do those residing upon the farms. I can not, however, comprehend how I can help those residing in cities by injuring those who reside in the country. Oklahoma is essentially an agricultural State. The merchants, bankers, clerks, professional classes, as well as all those engaged in mechanical pursuits, manufacturing and transportation, must realize that they are dependent for their own prosperity on the prosperity of our farmers. I am informed that in Oklahoma City there are nearly 5,000 men who are members of trade unions and labor organizations. But not a single one of these men has written me asking me to support this trade agreement with Canada.

GYPSUM ON FREE LIST.

Before I discuss this bill as to its general effect upon our country, I desire to register my objection to the provision that places crude gypsum upon the free list. I regard this provision a discrimination against Oklahoma, and especially against the industrial interests of the second congressional district. There are gypsum deposits in 16 States of the Union and also in Arizona and New Mexico. But in no State are the deposits so abundant and of such excellent quality as in the State of Oklahoma. The greater portion of this lies in my congressional district. The use of gypsum has largely increased in recent years. In 1897 there were but 188,000 tons of gypsum produced in the United States, while in 1909, only 12 years later, 2,252,785 tons were produced. The value of the product in 1909 was $5,906,738. The use of gypsum is being rapidly extended, and in view of the abundance of the deposit in the United States it is apparent that the further extension of its use will prove a blessing to mankind. Under the Dingley tariff law, approved in 1897, a tariff of 50 cents per ton was placed on crude gypsum. This was the first duty that was ever levied upon gypsum. Under this law there were large importations of gypsum from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Cape Breton, Canada. This gypsum was not manufactured in Canada, but brought down by cheap water transportation to gypsum mills in New York and other ports along the northeastern Atlantic coast line. These manufacturers and the owners of gypsum beds in Canada demanded that gypsum be placed on the free list. Under the bill as reported from the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and as it finally passed the House, the duty on gypsum was reduced from 50 cents to 40 cents per ton. But this was further reduced by the Senate bill to 20 cents per ton; but as the bill finally became a law the duty on crude gypsum was fixed at 30 cents per ton.

The reduction of the duty on gypsum resulted in about 20 per cent increase in the imports of crude gypsum in the year 1909 compared with the year 1908. With crude gypsum on the free list the importations of crude gypsum from Canada will largely increase. This will mean that just so much less of our own gypsum will be mined, manufactured, and consumed in the United States. In 1910 the United States collected over $100,000 in duty upon crude gypsum. The placing of gypsum on the free list will rob the Treasury of that much revenue. Canada will be several hundred thousand dollars richer in disposing of an increased amount of her crude gypsum. But the people who consume gypsum products in building and other purposes will get gypsum products no cheaper, as the gypsum mills of New York and other eastern cities will have in that section a monopoly of the trade.

My State, and especially my congressional district, has an inexhaustible supply of gypsum. In my district there are now some eight or nine gypsum mills in which large capital has been invested. These mills give employment to a large number of persons. It requires no argument to show that the increase in the importation of Canadian gypsum into the United States will decrease the demand for the products of the gypsum mills of Oklahoma, retard the expansion of the industry, and reduce the amount paid out for wages. In brief, free gypsum from Canada will to some extent at least injure the gypsum industry of my congressional district, and this is one of the reasons why I can not vote for the so-called reciprocity treaty with Canada.

GENERAL PROPOSITIONS.

Before we pass this bill we may well pause and consider what results must follow if this reciprocal trade agreement shall be put in operation.

First. How will it affect the farmers of the Untied States?

Second. How will it affect the farmers of Canada?

Third. How will it affect the masses of the nonfarming population of the United States?

Fourth. Who will reap the chief benefits from Canadian reciprocity?

Fifth. The general effect and influence this new policy will have upon us as a Nation.

RECIPROCITY WILL INJURE OUR FARMERS.

Free trade with Canada in agricultural products will inevitably injure the American farmer. There is no escape from the result.

If the proposed reciprocal trade agreement shall be put in force, its effect upon the farmer of the United States may be summarized as follows:

1. Reduction in the extent of his market.
2. Reduction in the price of his products.
3. Reduction in the value of his land.
4. Reduction in his annual profits.
5. Reduction in his ability to support his family.
6. Reduction in his value as a citizen.

These results are so certain, sure, and inevitable that they seem to be outside the realm of discussion. We can not, of course, determine to what extent these reductions will be made. But reductions all along the line will come.

REDUCTION IN MARKET.

First. There will be a reduction in the market of the farmers of the United States. This proposition needs no argument. There are over 90,000,000 of people in the United States. Two-thirds of these people are nonfarming population. These people are customers of the farmers. Through their ability to consume, the market of our farmers is created. With this law in effect the farmers of this country must divide their customers with the farmers of Canada. This means a reduction in the number of customers which our farmers now have. It means a division in the market. If you divide this market, you make it smaller. Our farmers can not give away part of what they have and still retain all they have.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF PRODUCTS.

Second. There will be a reduction in the price of our farm products. This will come, first, as the result of increased competition, and, second, under the inexorable decree of the law of supply and demand. Free trade in Canadian farm products will place our farmers in direct competition with Canadian farmers. Free competition always means lower prices. Competition, even on equality of conditions, may mean loss. Even if our farmers have equally as good conditions, there is still danger in competition. There would still be the absolute certainty that this competition must, from the nature of things, reduce the prices of the products of our farmers. The very object and purpose of the tariff on farm products is to relieve our farmers from foreign competition. The assertion, so often repeated, that the tariff upon farm products does not in any way affect the price of these products is untrue. There are two markets for everything we produce—the home market and the foreign or world's market. The protective tariff protects the farmer in the home market. It gives him that market practically free from competition abroad. Our home market is the best market in the world, because the customers in that market have the ability to buy and to pay good prices. With the home market largely free from competition, our farmers are then better equipped to go into the world's market and compete with all other nations in disposing of their surplus products.

The protective tariff affects the farmer in precisely the same way that it affects the manufacturer. It is said that the price of wheat in Liverpool fixes the price of wheat paid to our farmers. I do not concede this proposition. Our manufacturers sell their surplus products abroad. In 1909 our manufacturers, in finished products, sold in the world's markets goods valued at $440,229,407. They had to compete with the manufacturers of all other nations in the markets of the world. They met these foreign competitors in prices, in quality of goods, and in ability as salesmen. But no one pretends that these foreign markets where our manufacturers sell their surplus products control the prices our manufacturers receive at home.

If Canadian farm products come into our market free of duty, importations will be largely increased. In other words, the supply of farm products in our markets will be largely increased. There will, however, be no corresponding increase in the demand for these products. Then the law of supply and demand comes in and decrees that the price must go down. We may repeal the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, but neither the Congress of the United States nor the Imperial Parliament of Canada or Great Britain can repeal the law of supply and demand in its effect upon prices.

REDUCTION IN VALUE OF FARM LANDS.

Third. There will be a reduction in the price of farm lands in the United States. The price of farm products is the greatest factor in measuring the value of the land. This is demonstrated by what has taken place in the last 15 years in this country. There has been a large increase in the price of all farm products and a corresponding increase in the price of farm lands.

Eleven years ago the total value of our annual agricultural products was but $4,417,000,000. In 1909 these products in value reached the enormous sum of $9,000,000,000. In the meantime there had been a large increase in the value of farm lands, this per cent of increase being practically in the same ratio as the increase in the value of agricultural products.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to ask the gentleman one question. The gentleman says it would affect the price of the farmer's products in this country. How would it affect the price of the farmer's products in this country if this reciprocity measure were adopted?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the effect would be to make prices lower; it will put them down.

Mr. CULLOP. Are prices in Canada lower than they are here?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that prices in Canada, as a rule, are lower on farm products than they are in the United States.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not stop for a number of questions.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to be right, and I suppose the gentleman does——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield further?

Mr. MORGAN. For one more question.

Mr. CULLOP. Wheat was quoted yesterday at Winnipeg, Canada, at 93 cents a bushel and only 86 cents in St. Louis. Now, would the higher price of wheat in Canada lower the American farmer's price?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know what the quotations were yesterday at St. Louis; but, generally, wheat in the United States averages in price about 12 cents per bushel higher than the average price in Canada.

REDUCTION IN PROFITS.

Fourth. There will be a reduction in the profits of the farmers. This follows naturally the other three propositions. A reduction in the farmer's market, a reduction in the price of his products, and a reduction in the value of his land must mean a reduction in his profits.

To what extent the proposed Canadian reciprocity will reduce the general profits of the farmers of the United States no one, of course, can definitely determine. But whether a reduction of these profits be great or small, it will in the aggregate be of utmost importance to the farmers of this country. Last year the total value of our farm products amounted to $9,000,000,000. If the loss should be 1 per cent on the total value of products produced, it would mean a loss of $90,000,000 to the farmers of this country. If the losses amounted to 5 per cent, based upon the total value of farm products, the losses would amount to $450,000,000 per annum. But whatever the loss may be, the Congress of the United States should under no circumstance enact any legislation that means the loss of a single dollar to the farmers of the United States.

REDUCTION IN ABILITY TO SUPPORT HIS FAMILY.

Fifth. Canadian reciprocity will reduce the ability of the farmer of the United States to provide for his family. The welfare of the family of the farmer may well challenge our most earnest consideration. On an average the boys and girls of the farmers of the United States do not have equal opportunity with the boys and girls in the family of the nonfarming population of this country. The family of the farmer is greatly restricted in social, educational, and religious advantages. They are often remote from the school, from the church, and from the social center. These conditions make farm life nonattractive and to a large extent are responsible for the desertion of our farms.

REDUCTION IN VALUE OF THE FARMER AS A CITIZEN.

Sixth. We reduce the value of the farmer as a citizen of the United States. When you have divided and circumscribed the market of the farmers, reduced the prices of his products, reduced the value of his land, curtailed his profits, reduced his ability to provide his family with the necessary comforts and advantages of life, it must then follow that you have thereby made the farmer a less valuable citizen. Not less valuable because the farmer will cease to be patriotic, but because by legislation you have shorn him of the means whereby he might serve his country.

EFFECT ON THE CANADIAN FARMERS.

Having determined what this reciprocity agreement will do to the farmer of the United States, let us briefly consider what effect this trade agreement, if put into force, will have upon the Canadian farmers. Naturally, the very reverse will come to the Canadian farmers. Free trade with Canada in agricultural products will have the following effect upon the Canadian farmer:

1. It will increase and extend his market.
2. It will increase the price of his products.
3. It will increase the value of his land.
4. It will increase his annual profits.
5. It will increase his ability to provide for his family.
6. It will increase his value as a citizen of his country.

Before this bill passes the title of the bill should be amended so as to make it read: "A bill to encourage Canadian agriculture, extend the market of the Canadian farmer, increase the prices of his products, augment the value of his land, magnify his annual profits, and make him a more valuable citizen of the British Empire."

For one I shall cast my vote for the farmers of the United States rather than for the farmers of Canada. I stand for a policy that will extend the market of our farmers, increase the price of their products, augment the value of their land, increase their profits, and make them more independent, prosperous, contented, and happy.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN. I decline to yield.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to ask you just one other question.

Mr. MORGAN. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I would be glad to do so if I had more time.

EFFECT ON THE NONFARMING POPULATION.

The proposed reciprocal trade agreement will not greatly benefit the great masses of the nonfarming population. The hope of a reduction in the cost of living will not be realized. The high cost of living is not mainly due to the prices the farmer receives for his products. The farm prices of products are not now too high. On the average, the consumer pays double the price the farmer receives. The middlemen are responsible for any exorbitant prices that are paid for food products. The cost of distribution is excessive.

The real difficulty lies in the fact that food products after leaving the farmer's hands too frequently go into the hands of monopoly. The farmers are unorganized. There is free competition between the 6,000,000 of our farmers. Why not Congress strike at the real disease with which our Nation is suffering? Why not enact laws that will control all the private monopolies of our country?

If we have not the power now, let the Constitution be amended so as to give the National Government the power to control our great industrial corporations that have it in their power to control the prices of the necessaries of life. This would be a step in the right direction, and a step that would be effective. Canadian reciprocity, as now proposed, will reduce the prices our farmers receive for their products, but will not reduce the price the consumer pays, because the great corporations fix the prices paid by the consumer. Canadian reciprocity in farm products simply means untold injury to our farmers, with no benefit to the masses of the nonfarming population of this country.

WHERE THE BENEFITS GO.

All will concede that the proposed agreement if ratified would greatly augment the trade and commerce between the two countries. The material advantage from this increased trade in this country must go largely to those engaged in trade and commerce. Transportation companies, manufacturers, and merchants are the persons that will be benefited by this additional trade and commerce. Our great railway lines will be benefited, because it means an increased volume of business. The great cities will be benefited, because there our railways center, and it is from these centers that trade and commerce proceed.

This reciprocity agreement if put into effect means greater dividends for owners of stock in our railways, more business for our merchants in our great cities on the north, and greater profits for that portion of our population engaged in trade and commerce. It means to our great cities lying within reasonable proximity to the Canadian border more business, increased trade, additional commerce, larger population, enhanced values in real estate, more wealth, and better opportunities in life. These benefits will go to the men of means rather than the poor; to the directors of corporations; to merchants with capital; to men employed at large salaries; and to professional classes. The men employed in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits and by transportation companies will receive no special benefit from the proposed reciprocal trade agreement.

WILL DESTROY OUR INDUSTRIAL INDEPENDENCE.

The United States is to-day the most independent nation on earth. We have the ability to feed and clothe and house and equip our own people. We produce an abundance of all the necessaries of life. From an industrial standpoint we are independent of the world. We lead all other nations in the four great industrial pursuits—internal commerce, mining, manufacturing, and agriculture. We are well balanced in our industrial strength. We were first a nation of farmers. Agriculture was the chief pursuit of our people. That day has passed. Manufacturing has overtaken and surpassed agriculture. Our annual manufactured products are valued at $14,000,000,000; our annual agricultural products are valued at only $9,000,000,000. It is not our manufacturing interests but agriculture that needs encouragement to-day. But instead of encouraging agriculture by this bill you are enacting a law that will depress agriculture.

If we pass this bill and the reciprocal trade agreement shall go into effect, from that time on the United States has lost one of the chief props that makes her to-day the greatest nation on earth. We have lost our industrial independence. We cease to feed our own people. We look to Canada for bread. In peace and in war we look to a foreign nation to supply us with the "staff of life." Think of the folly of a great country like the United States, blessed with a soil and a climate that should always make agriculture her chief industry, giving up in the contest and entering upon the policy of buying her bread from a people that owe allegiance to a foreign flag. If such a policy is to be pursued, if such a result must come, it must come without my vote, without my support, and without my approval.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that I might be able simply to say "Amen" to the splendid sentiments that were so eloquently expressed by the Democratic Member from Massachusetts on the Ways and Means Committee of this House of Representatives [Mr. PETERS], and that has been my purpose during the long time since this debate has been going on. But although I am unable to get in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of to-day a transcript of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, the former Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON] during the course of the debate yesterday said:

> And now I want to say one word more to you men of Massachusetts. I love Massachusetts. She has done more than any other State in shaping the sentiment and promoting the civilization of the Commonwealths of the country; more than any other State in the great Republic. Did you vote for Foss?

That was the query of the former Speaker.

> He was elected. Is that the permanent sentiment of Massachusetts? When the penalty comes, as it will between now and 1912, and consumption and production are narrowed, are you still going to support Foss? Is he your leader?
> This agreement might well be labeled—

Continued Mr. CANNON, in his inimitable manner—

> "By the grace or the punishment of God and the aid of the Secretary of State and Foss of Massachusetts." Choose ye.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to say, in reply to those questions, that we, the people of Massachusetts, have chosen, not after the short season of an autumnal campaign, but we have chosen after a contest for Canadian reciprocity that has covered at least 10 of the last years in the political history of the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent; and it is only because I know something of that political history and because I have been permitted to have some small share of leadership in the campaigns that have been conducted that I crave the indulgence of the House for the limited time at my disposal to address myself to these queries.

Did we vote for Foss—Foss, who in 1902 and 1904, as a Republican candidate for Congress in the Back Bay district of Boston, tried to come to this Congress on the issue of reciprocity with Canada? He was practically driven out of the Republican Party because of the insistence with which he supported resolutions in Republican conventions favoring this doctrine of Canadian reciprocity. I say he was practically driven out, because, while the gentleman himself has always insisted that he was driven out by our brilliant senior Senator, HENRY CABOT LODGE, I have lately discussed the matter with the Senator, and he says that there never was any driving, but that he always had the most kindly sentiments for Canadian reciprocity.

I suppose that reciprocity became a live issue in the politics of Massachusetts in 1892. I have found that in the national platforms of the Republican and Democratic Parties of that year, 1892, reciprocity was first mentioned; that in the Democratic platform of 1892 the language used was:

> Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith, but we denounce the sham reciprocity, which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges, by pretending to establish closer trade relations for a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural products, with other countries that are also agricultural, while erecting a customhouse barrier of prohibitive tariff taxes against the richest countries of the world, that stand ready to take our entire surplus of products and to exchange therefor commodities which are necessaries and comforts of life among our own people.

I conceive that was good Democratic doctrine in 1892, and I believe, sir, that it is equally good Democratic doctrine now in 1911. I want to contrast, in the record of this House, as I have contrasted in my own mind, the declaration of the Republican Party in that same year on the "triumph of reciprocity." Why, you would believe, from reading the Republican platform of 1892, that reciprocity then had ultimately triumphed, and that under no possible condition of circumstances could it be a matter which in 1911 would engage the attention of the American Congress for the length of time that we have given to it during the past week or 10 days.

> We point to the success of the Republican policy of reciprocity—

> under which our export trade has vastly increased and new and enlarged markets have been opened for the products of our farms and workshops. We remind the people of the bitter opposition of the Democratic Party to this practical business measure, and claim that, executed by a Republican administration, our present laws will eventually give us control of the trade of the world.

Mr. Chairman, the limited study that I have been able to give to the history of this question makes me believe that possibly there was a time in the history of our country when reciprocity was a live thing in our commercial system, but that, sir, was before it was "executed" by a Republican administration.

It was nearly 10 years after these party platform declarations, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of Canadian reciprocity came entirely to the front in the political and economic discussions of our State, but by that time it was clear to all that the matter would have to come to a final settlement.

Mr. Foss, Mr. Henry M. Whitney, the men who composed the Reciprocity League and the Free Trade League, and many others kept insisting that the making of an agreement like that contained in the pending bill would be of tremendous advantage to the Commonwealth and to the country, and their views were given wide publicity by the great newspapers of Boston and the State.

Senator LODGE was the chief spokesman of the many who were opposed to the views of these men, at least to the form in which those views were presented, if not, indeed, to the substance of them. I want to have printed in the record of this debate certain speeches that I have read again with interest in the wonderful Library of Congress that we have here, during the short time since this session has been sitting. I believe these speeches will do more to clarify the minds of the country and of this Congress than any words or original thoughts that I might attempt to contribute to the discussion at this time.

Let me read, therefore, so much of Senator LODGE's speech before the Home Market Club on April 2, 1903, as relates to reciprocity with Canada, that you may determine for yourself the extent of interest that he had at that time in the measure and the kind of interest that he was taking.

> It is very evident that the Democratic Party in the failure of all their other issues propose to fight the next national campaign upon the tariff and its allied questions. Under the soft and deceptive name of tariff reform or tariff revision they propose to renew their old attack upon the protective policy. Signs of their purpose abound on all sides, not the least significant being the pleasing recrudescence of Mr. Cleveland. So high, indeed, is their enthusiasm rising that evidence lately taken in the city of Boston indicates that zealous tariff reformers in certain parts of this city, not content with a single vote, have severally voted, three, four, and as often as seven times for the promotion of the cause they have so much at heart. Therefore, Mr. President, it will not be out of place for me to say a few words in regard to a phase of the tariff question which has been the subject of some recent discussion.
> I refer to Canadian reciprocity. From the utterances of the free-trade newspapers one would suppose that Canadian reciprocity was some solid, tangible object, which, if obtained, would shower wealth upon the United States, and that we are prevented from grasping it in our hands solely by the malign opposition of the Republican Party. Another idea emanating from the same source and which I saw repeated in a speech the other day in our legislature, appears to be that Canada is longing to open her markets to American manufacturers, and that the Republican Party will not permit her to do it. All this is, of course, an utter misconception. Reciprocity with Canada, as with any other country, is a commercial agreement reached through negotiations in which each country makes concessions in return for similar concessions on the part of the other. Canada is not seeking to open her markets to our products. On the contrary, she has, thus far, steadily refused to do so, and reciprocity with Canada has not only not been prevented by the Republican Party, but the Republican Party is the only party which has made and is making any effort to bring it about. Let me briefly trace the history of Canadian reciprocity, for that will give us the facts, which are, on the whole, more comfortable to live with than large phrases and vague vaporings.

In 1854 the Elgin treaty of reciprocity went into effect for 10 years and was terminated by notice in 1866. In the treaty of Washington in 1871, under the administration of Gen. Grant, a Republican, there were reciprocal provisions with the Dominion relating to export duties, goods in transit, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and the fisheries, limited to 12 years. In 1883 the United States notified Great Britain of her intention to terminate the fishery clauses, and they were accordingly terminated on July 1, 1885. President Cleveland, Democrat, then made a fishery treaty which was so injurious to our fishing industries that it was rejected by the Senate, 30 Senators voting against ratification and 27 in favor. When it is considered that a treaty requires two-thirds majority in order to pass, the magnitude of the defeat may be easily understood.

Mr. Cleveland, however, made no effort to bring about a treaty of general reciprocity with the Dominion of Canada. President Harrison, a Republican, through Mr. Blaine, his Secretary of State, also a Republican, opened negotiations for a treaty of reciprocity with Canada, but the negotiations were broken off because Canada declined even to consider opening her markets to our manufacturers. You will observe the Republican Party tried to obtain reciprocity at that time, but was thwarted by Canada, and it is well for those who shout loudly for Canadian reciprocity to remember that the United States does not make a treaty by itself alone, but with another country, and that the other country has something to say. So the Harrison attempt failed through the refusal of Canada to admit our manufacturers at reduced rates. During the next four years of Mr. Cleveland, a Democrat and a free trader, no attempt was made, so far as I am aware, to establish reciprocity with Canada.

President McKinley, a Republican, came in in 1897. He immediately took measures for a negotiation with Canada to establish reciprocity and to settle certain other pending differences. The joint commission appointed for this purpose met in the summer of 1898 and again the following winter. The insistence of Canada upon certain claims in regard to the Alaskan boundary, which our commissioners regarded as untenable, and her refusal to separate the Alaskan question from the other matters under discussion, led to the adjournment of the joint commission without action. Again the negotiations had failed through the action of Canada. President McKinley then endeavored to make other arrangements for the Alaskan question, and England refused. The same effort was made a year ago by President Roosevelt, a Republican, and that likewise failed through England's refusal.

This year Mr. Hay, a Republican, succeeded in negotiating a treaty, under which the Alaskan question has been referred to a separate commission. This was an absolutely essential step toward making possible any negotiations for a convention of reciprocity. I had some part in securing the ratification of this Alaskan treaty by the Senate, and one of my principal motives was that it cleared the way for a renewal of the negotiations of 1898 and the establishment of reciprocity thereby, so far as reciprocity was possible. It seems to me that the negotiation of this treaty by Mr. Hay and its ratification by the Senate, thus removing the obstacle to reciprocity negotiations, was a more practical service to the cause of Canadian reciprocity than talking about it in the newspapers or passing resolutions.

The commission of 1898 will soon be called together, and among other questions they will consider that of reciprocal trade between Canada and the United States, and will endeavor to reach an agreement upon that and other points. Thus it will be seen from this statement of facts that the Republican Party and Republican Presidents alone have done all that has been done to bring about Canadian reciprocity, and that the failure of the negotiations since 1888 has in every instance been due to the attitude of Canada. These plain facts will have, I am aware, no effect upon those servants of truth who discuss Canadian reciprocity in the columns of the Boston Herald and the Springfield Republican. They will continue to portray the Republican Party as endeavoring to prevent Canadian reciprocity and myself in particular as its bitter opponent. Personally, I have always supported the Republican policy of reciprocity with Canada, and I have not only done this winter what I could to remove the obstacle to reciprocity negotiations by securing the ratification of the Alaskan treaty, but I introduced a bill for reciprocity in coal and should have pressed it as an amendment to the bill removing the duties on coal for one year, if I had not been convinced that to do so would have delayed the passage of that measure so much desired by the country at that moment of stress and exigency.

Experience has convinced me that reciprocity by convention with competing countries generally in competitive products is impracticable, and that the result we desire in that direction can be reached only by legislation.

But I have felt, and still feel, that with Cuba and Canada, which adjoin the United States, we still might make reciprocity agreements. We have made a reciprocity treaty with Cuba. Apart from all moral and political considerations, that treaty in its reciprocal provisions was the most advantageous to the United States of any reciprocal treaty I have ever seen, yet the extreme difficulty of securing reciprocity with Cuba, either by law or treaty, has been made manifest to the country, and it is well for the Democratic newspapers and orators who are trying here to make an issue out of Canadian reciprocity to be reminded of the fact that with a single exception every vote in the Senate against that Cuban treaty of reciprocity was cast by a Democrat. I hope that the commission which is to meet again to consider our differences with Canada will be able to make a reciprocity arrangement beneficial to both countries, but I do not propose to mislead anybody by painting bright visions of the prosperity which is to pour in upon us under such a treaty. I was told this winter by a leading member of the Canadian Parliament that Canada would never make a reduction on manufactured products, for she desired to continue her preference to England; that all Canada wanted was reciprocity in natural products; and, with the exception of coal, I do not see much advantage to New England in that proposition. I have seen it stated also in the newspapers that the coal interests of Canada have passed resolutions against reciprocity in coal. Nevertheless I hope we shall be able to make some mutually advantageous trade arrangements with Canada.

I do not think they are likely to be very extensive, and none will be made that does not give to the United States an adequate return for any concessions made by us. I have now stated the whole case of Canadian reciprocity. If it is ever brought about so as to be in any measure beneficial to our industries and our trade, it will be through the efforts of the Republican Party alone, for the party of protection is the only party that will ever make reciprocal arrangements, because the free-trade Democratic Party is by the very nature of their belief opposed to a policy like reciprocity, which can of necessity come only through the existence of a tariff.

Let me pass next to a particular phase of reciprocity with our neighbors on this continent, as embodied in the convention now pending in the Senate between the United States and Newfoundland. This is a treaty of reciprocity in tariff duties. Some people appear to think that reciprocity means that some other country will admit our products free of duty or at lowered rates if the Republican Party out of pure malevolence does not prevent it.

Other persons seem to suppose, if we may judge by what they say, that a reciprocity treaty consists in admitting the products of some other country to our markets at lowered rates of duty or entirely free. The first conception is ridiculous and the second is merely an effort to get free trade in spots. True reciprocity is neither of these things. Reciprocity in trade, as I have said, is an arrangement between two countries by which, in consideration of mutual concessions, mutual advantages in tariff rates are supposed to be given. There is, therefore, only one test to be applied to a convention of this kind, and that is whether in return for the concessions which we make we receive a proper equivalent. We must examine first the concessions made by us and weigh their effect upon the domestic industry or industries involved, and we must then see whether we receive in return adequate concessions from the other party to the convention.

In the Hay-Bond treaty the price which we pay to Newfoundland for the concessions which she is supposed to make to us is at the expense of a single industry. Under this convention we agree that substantially all the important products of the deep sea and shore fisheries, as well as salmon, trout, and salmon trout, shall be admitted to our markets free of duty, with the single exception of fresh codfish. This is a very sweeping and a very large gift, and in it are involved the fortunes of a great industry. The men who carry on that industry, without a dissenting voice, testify that this removal of duty means to them substantial ruin, and they are the people who can judge best and who must first be considered. I will not enter into the details of their case, for time forbids. I will merely state the principle involved and one fatal objection.

The removal of all protective duties from cured or salt fish will result in the transfer of our salting and curing establishments to Newfoundland, because Newfoundland is nearer the fishing grounds and the labor there is cheaper. But that is not all. Where the great packing and curing establishments are placed there will the fishermen go, and if the packing and curing establishments are transferred to Newfoundland the fishing fleet of New England will follow them and become English and Canadian. This is the united testimony of the men whose all is at stake on the fisheries, and it can not be disregarded or brushed aside. I have been accused of being sectional and local and of abandoning the interests of the country at large to Gloucester, because I have opposed this sacrifice. Do you imagine that it is Gloucester alone whose interests are at stake? I would fight long before I would sacrifice the interests of Gloucester, that historic, gallant town, even if she stood alone; but she does not stand alone, and those who think she does simply disclose their ignorance of our fisheries. When you strike Gloucester you strike the men of Essex, who build her fishing fleet; the men of Swampscott, who build her dories; the factories which make her nets; the paper mills of Springfield and Holyoke, which make labels for her products and the boxes in which her fish are packed; and the great railroad which she helps to feed with freight and passengers. That is Gloucester alone.

Now, come down here to Boston. Forty-eight of the firms who deal in fresh fish in this city and own your fishing fleets protest against this treaty. Ninety captains, who go out from the port of Boston and from Cape Cod to reap the dangerous harvest of the Grand Banks and the Georges, have protested to the Senate against this treaty. Provincetown protests against it. Pass out beyond our borders; the State of Maine, with 17,000 fishermen, protests against it through the representatives of the industry and through her Senators and Members of Congress. The fishermen of the Chesapeake in Maryland have been heard against it. The menhaden fisheries, whose establishments dot the coast from Rhode Island to North Carolina, have formally protested against this removal of the duties on fish. The Pacific coast, with its great and growing fisheries in Alaskan waters, joins with their brethren of the Atlantic and protest. These are some of the facts, and yet some persons say it is a local interest and we must not sacrifice everything to a single town.

I repeat, these fishing industries declare that the removal of the duties will be ruinous to them. Bear that in mind, for one great industry must not be sacrificed in the mere hope of helping others or on the vague promise of general advantages. Now, what do we get in return? First, the privilege to take bait without a license. The only people who use bait are the fishermen, and they are the only people entitled to speak on this point. They declare unanimously that the bait privilege is of no value. Last year two vessels from Maine and about thirty-five from Gloucester took out bait licenses at a cost of something over $4,000. The amount was trifling and the fishermen do not care whether they pay or not.

They do not need licenses now, and they do not care whether Newfoundland refuses them bait or not, for with modern refrigerating arrangements they can supply themselves perfectly well from Eastport or Gloucester. It is but yesterday that Provincetown shipped two cargoes of bait to the French fishermen at Miquelon. Therefore, so far as the fishermen are concerned, they get nothing whatever for the removal of duties which now protect their product. Let us pass next to what the United States at large will get by sacrificing her fishing industries. Seventy-one articles are enumerated in this treaty as on the free list. I asked the gentlemen who appeared in support of the treaty how many of these articles were already on the free list. They did not know. I did, for I had taken the trouble to look it up.

Sixty-three of the 71 articles enumerated in the treaty as on the free list are on the free list now. Of the remaining eight, seven are agricultural implements, and those can only be imported free by residents of Newfoundland when not for sale; that is, we can not export them free of duty to Newfoundland, and the apparent concession is nothing. There remains one article, "gas engines covered by patent," taken by the treaty from the dutiable list and placed on the free list.

Do you think we can build up a trade in "gas engines covered by patent" sufficient to compensate for the loss of the fisheries? I take leave to doubt it. We now come to the dutiable list mentioned in the treaty. There are 16 of these articles. On bacon, ham, tongue, smoked beef, and sausages there is a reduction of three-quarters of a cent a pound, of 20 cents a barrel on peas, and 10 cents a barrel on oatmeal.

The other 9 articles remain at the present rate. I asked the gentlemen who appeared in behalf of the treaty whether there was any reduction in flour. They said no; that 25 cents a barrel was the existing duty, and so far they were correct, but they were so ignorant of their own case that they apparently were not aware that there was a punitive duty on flour of 50 cents a barrel directed against any nation placing a duty on Newfoundland fish.

The punitive duty would come off if the treaty was ratified, but I do not believe in making concessions to any people in return for the removal of punitive, discriminating duties. I believe in giving advantages to our friends and discriminating against those who discriminate against us. Does the treaty provide that these rates shall remain? Not at all. It simply provides that if rates are raised they shall not be raised against us higher than against anybody else. Why did not Newfoundland admit to her free or reduced list boots and shoes, rubber boots or woolen blankets? That would have been of some benefit to the industries of New England and the United States. But those are left untouched and with a preference to England on both blankets and rubber boots. What does the Newfoundland market amount to? There are 210,000 people in Newfoundland, according to the last census.

In Massachusetts and Maine alone there are 100,000 directly dependent on the fisheries, without adding those who live by the allied industries, and they are consumers who give you an exclusive market. Of this Newfoundland population 55,000 are engaged in the fisheries, 1,547 are farmers, 2,682 mechanics, 1,258 miners. How many farm implements or gas engines do you think we should sell to that population? And on the articles chiefly used by three-quarters of the population, who are engaged in the fisheries, we get no reduction. The total imports of Newfoundland in 1900 were $7,500,000 from all countries. When you remember that the exports of domestic products from the United States in 1902 was $1,300,000,000, the amount of the entire Newfoundland import does not seem very imposing, and our actual export to that island of $2,000,000 still less so.

But I will give you a better comparison. The manufactured shipping value of Gloucester's products alone was $6,000,000 in 1901. If we should get the entire value of all the Newfoundland imports it would not much more than cover the value of the fisheries of Gloucester alone, and the value of the product of the fishermen of the United States is $46,000,000. We want to think carefully before we endanger an industry whose annual product is $46,000,000 in seeking a market where we now sell only $2,000,000 and to which this treaty opens no additional door. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee were the representatives of a Newfoundland steamship company, an Englishman engaged in Newfoundland business in New York, Mr. Hall representing the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Osborne Howes, who is connected with the business of insurance and is the principal editorial writer on the Boston Herald. The first three gentlemen argued for the treaty on the general ground that it would improve our trade relations with Newfoundland and tend to prevent the island from becoming a part of the Dominion of Canada. They did not show, and were unable to show, that there was any direct benefit to our trade in this treaty, and their testimony as to the fisheries was slight and of no value, because they had no personal knowledge of them and were not engaged in them.

They all testified, however, that in their opinion the removal of the duties proposed in the treaty would not lower the price of fish in the United States, so that the treaty, according to its advocates, would be of no benefit whatever to the American consumer. I should like to see general trade relations with Newfoundland improved, I should be glad to make a treaty with Newfoundland, but I want something in the treaty which shall be of advantage to us and satisfactory to our fishermen. Mr. Osborne Howes, the last advocate of the treaty before the committee, used one argument peculiar to himself and which I can not pass over in silence. He said that the fishing vessels of Gloucester were no longer manned by native-born Americans, but largely by men of foreign birth. He explained this fact by the statement that "it is a dangerous business, and that is the reason Americans do not care to enter into it." In my opinion he exaggerates the fact, and I am certain that his explanation is utterly wrong.

Native-born Americans have abandoned many employments because they can find others more remunerative, but they never abandoned anything through cowardice and fear of danger, either in war or peace. He also undertook to show from a single death roll that these men were not, as a rule, naturalized. This last proposition is incorrect. There is a large percentage of foreign-born men among our fishermen, but most of them are naturalized and a very large proportion remain in the United States and bring up their families there. Three hundred and thirty men from Gloucester enlisted in the War with Spain. Of these 287 resided in Gloucester. One hundred and sixty were American citizens, many of them native born. Of the 170 remaining more than half had taken out their first papers, leaving about 85 to be classed as foreigners. This, I think, is a fair statement of the proportion.

Mr. Howes's argument was that the fishermen having ceased to be in large proportion native born, were no longer entitled to protection. That to me is a new doctrine. The man who carries the naturalization papers of the United States has the same rights in every way to the protection of the Government as the man born on the soil. Mr. Howes, who has the temptations which beset all great rhetoricians, referred to these men as "the mercenaries of the sea," who are willing to face perils which the native born, according to Mr. Howes, are too cowardly to encounter. He has a well-known faculty of making telling phrases. It is to his vivid pen that we owe the sentences that "the flag is a piece of textile fabric" and "patriotism is a virtue of barbarians." But, Mr. President, when we talk about "the mercenaries of the seas," it seems to me that, although he declared that he used the word without disrespect, he is applying a harsh term to men who gain their living in a hardy and dangerous pursuit, too dangerous, as Mr. Howes says, for the native born.

The "mercenaries of the sea!" Why, then, any man who works for wages is a mercenary if he happens not to have been born on American soil. Men who come to New England and toil in our mills are, under his teaching, the "mercenaries of the factories." Mr. President, I confess that I revolt against such an idea, and I think it would be just as fair to say that the man who earns a large income by instructing us in the columns of the Herald how this Government ought to be run is a mercenary of the press. Just one word in conclusion before I leave this matter of the fisheries. There is something more to me in this question than balancing dollars and cents and imports and exports.

Mr. Howes sneered at the argument for the fishermen based on sentiment. I do not. I can not forget that before Endicott landed at Salem the New England fishermen were established on Cape Ann. I can not forget the record of the Gloucester men in the Revolution and the War of 1812. I know that whether native born or foreign born they sent more men in proportion to their population into the Navy of the United States in the Spanish War than any other city or town in the country. I know that of their recruits 76 per cent passed the physical examination, against 14 per cent in Boston and 7 per cent in New York.

I know from the lips of captains and admirals that they were men fit for any duty as soon as they came on board the ship. There are 6,000 of them on that fishing fleet, and when you want them in the day of great stress you can have them for the asking. Do not forget the peril of their calling. Over 2,000 men from this one town have given up their lives in this industry in the last 25 years—nearly a hundred a year. Go down to Gloucester in the autumn and you will hear the annual death roll called. You may read of it in the words of Kipling in "Captains Courageous." If you had been there a month ago, you would have seen the other yearly ceremony of Gloucester. They can not lay wreaths upon the ground where their dead sleep, but the children go out by the edge of the sounding sea and cast flowers upon the waves, for there in that pathless, unmarked waste their dead are buried.

Gloucester represents only part of the great American fisheries, but I say again—and you may call me local, if you will—that if Gloucester with her history stood all alone I would not in the face of that history desert her, and I would plead her cause as best I might at the bar of the Senate of the United States. I shall not be called upon to do so, but if I were I should not plead in vain. Massachusetts would be with me, and the United States from California to Maine. They would be with me, because the patriotism in war and the silent courage in peace of these poor fishermen ranging daily through gray northern seas are known to the world, and patriotism and courage are beloved of the American people and never are out of fashion.

I commend this speech to the Republican Members of this House who are disposed to be timid about supporting the pending legislation, for, whatever charges we Democrats of Massachusetts have at any time been disposed to make against Mr. LODGE, we have always known that he is a most brilliant exponent of regular Republicanism; and when he assures us, as he does in the speech that I have read, that the Republican Party has always stood for reciprocity with Canada, but that Canada has always stood in the way of it, we have the right to expect at this time, when Canada stands not in the way, the vote of every Republican who would stand true to the teachings of his party.

Can it be that in this instance Mr. LODGE was wrong in his exposition of Republicanism on the matter of reciprocity? Surely the Republican speeches that we have listened to in this Chamber during the sessions of this Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union bear some testimony against his views.

Can it be that the Republican Party has only stood for reciprocity with Canada when Canada has stood in the way of it?

Those of us who hail from Massachusetts would not be greatly surprised to find that this is so, for we know the treatment that was accorded to Mr. Foss in Massachusetts when he tried to put the Republican Party there on record in favor of it. We have not forgotten that he was hooted down in a Republican State convention when he tried to exercise his right as a delegate to have a resolution adopted in favor of it, and we have not forgotten that he told those who hooted him down that some day the people of the Commonwealth would listen with interest to his words.

We have not forgotten the points that he made in speeches and in writings in favor of reciprocity, and I am glad to be able to read to you from another bound pamphlet that was given to the Boston Public Library, as the bookplate says, "by Eugene Noble Foss."

This pamphlet has an address on the "Trade relations between the United States and Canada," which was made in Boston, Mass., in 1904, while Mr. Foss was yet active in the ranks of the Republican Party. Let me read this speech to you, rather than tell you what it says, so that you may know exactly what the views of Mr. Foss at that time were:

MR. PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE CANADIAN CLUB:

I confess that I am beginning to feel at home here. This is the third time I have been made the recipient of your courtesy, and I believe that our meeting has helped us to understand each other better.

Now, Mr. President, I am not assuming that your members and guests are on one side of the reciprocity fence and I on the other; or even that our distinguished guest from over the line is so far from our point of view that he can hold nothing in common with the friends of commercial reciprocity in the United States.

You will recall that at a former meeting of this club your guests were a leading Canadian journalist and a prominent manufacturer from Ontario; and you will remember that after we all had had our say, we discovered that the ideas, or fundamental principles, for which each of us stood were broad and liberal enough to enfold us all. I trust we will reach the same conclusions to-night.

CANADIAN SENTIMENT NOT MISUNDERSTOOD.

It is a mistake to suppose that we who have led in the movement for closer trade relations with Canada do not understand what present conditions are. In fact, the logic of the situation, the unmistakable index of the facts bearing upon it, has compelled us to accept very much of the Canadian view. Notwithstanding our wealth, our power, our resources, our influence, we have regarded the small group of neighbors at the north as competitors to be feared and excluded, not as friends and customers to be given the hand of commercial welcome. We have massed our seventy-five millions of people against their five millions and entrenched ourselves behind a wall over which the frightful shapes of our supposed commercial enemies could not climb. They have planted a 25-foot wall against our trusts and we have builded a 50-foot wall against their farmers and fishermen.

I am neither unpatriotic nor unrepublican in thus admitting the mistaken course which the United States has pursued with respect to Canada. I quote these facts merely to show to some of our Canadian friends who apparently think otherwise, that many of us who have been foremost in the reciprocity movement have not been blind to the unequal conditions which exist. In all the agitation which has been going on so incessantly the past few years, our main request has been that our own people appreciate these conditions. I have no sympathy with the political jingoism which would make these conditions an excuse for doing nothing to correct them.

We have not the right to ask anything of Canada that is not for her interest. We shall only make ourselves ridiculous if we do. The burden is upon us to prove that freer trade between the two countries will benefit both; for times have changed, and it is not now Canada that is seeking reciprocity.

I believe in the principle of protection, which is fundamental in this country. By the same token, I can have no criticism to offer of the growing desire of the Canadian people to protect themselves from destructive foreign competition. I can, however, properly point out that protection carried to the point of exclusion is not protection, it is imposition; and I can suggest that our Canadian friends will do well to learn this truth from our experience and not from their own.

EXCLUSION IS NOT PROTECTION.

I would like to ram this fact home with another; and we can also supply the object lesson in this case. We have built up our own country in spite of domestic competition fiercer than Canadian industries ever can be called upon to suffer. If we can do this here, what can we not do for Canada under fair and reasonable trade conditions? So far the Dominion has shown her wisdom in refusing to cut herself off from the facilities with which we can help her to develop her immense resources. Does she now contemplate fastening upon herself the heaviest possible form of indirect taxation merely because we have refused her tariff favors which other countries are disposed to grant? Or, on the other hand, shall the blindness and arrogance of our own stand-pat contingent be permitted to force such a policy upon a friendly customer?

Granted that the markets of Great Britain are of more present importance to Canada than those of the United States, shall we forever continue to ignore the value of our Canadian trade, whether it be coming or going? These are questions which the people of both countries will do well to ponder.

Fortunately for a partial solution of the vexed question of trade relations, our own necessities bid fair to force our Government to look the Canadian question squarely in the face. In several commodities our demand already has outrun our supply, and we are buying heavily, regardless of tariff taxes. In others the exchanges between the two countries are so general, for geographical and other reasons, that a lively trade in competing products has developed both ways. In practically all these products the tariff serves no useful purpose, but adds a burden of expense which is without profit to either party to the transaction. In still other cases where the demand is great, the United States tariff is yet so high that no purchases are attempted.

HERE IS A BASIS FOR RECIPROCITY.

These three classes furnish the basis upon which a consistent scheme of tariff revision must rest. You will notice that I use the current phrase, "tariff revision," but by it I mean "reciprocity." And I wish to say right here that I do not believe in any kind of tariff revision or tariff legislation which does not recognize reciprocity as a fundamental principle. I wish to declare, and this is as good an opportunity as any, that reciprocity is just as much and just as great a principle, a system, a primary economic policy, if you will, as free trade or protection, as they are commonly understood.

I believe that it will not long hence become recognized as a practical working system infinitely superior to either stand-pat protection or free trade. It will recognize your friends, customers, and allies in a commonsense and common-justice fashion, instead of attacking them as does stand-pattism, or favoring your enemies at your own expense, as does doctrinaire free trade. Any good business man or good neighbor will go a great way and sacrifice much to favor and benefit these by whom he lives or profits largely. Hence, I go in for some system of tariff revision in the future which shall aim to benefit, as well as ourselves, countries which make their prosperity ours. This is simply good business as well as good morals, Gen. Draper and William Whitman to the contrary notwithstanding.

I have said that the basis of tariff revision, or reciprocity, as far as Canada is concerned, must rest upon three classes of articles; that is to say, articles which each country must buy of the other, duty or no duty, or in which they make a mutually profitable interchange under natural conditions.

As an illustration, I have prepared a table showing the principal articles in which the two countries have an interchangeable trade. These figures show our exports to Canada and dutiable imports therefrom of practically identical articles in 1903:

United States exchanges with Canada, 1903.

	Exports.	Imports (dutiable).
Horses	$2,121,000	$295,000
Sheep	174,000	986,000
Breadstuffs[1]	5,532,000	843,000
Coal (bituminous)	9,668,000	4,811,000
Eggs	78,000	18,000
Fish	743,000	2,859,000
Fruits[2]	1,008,000	133,000
Hay	108,000	2,236,000
Hides	521,000	1,186,000
Iron ore	264,000	320,000
Dairy products	192,000	24,000
Vegetables	651,000	493,000
Wood, unmanufactured	4,766,000	13,830,000
Wood pulp	38,000	1,867,000
Gypsum		319,000
	25,864,000	30,220,000

[1] Exclusive of corn. [2] Varieties common to both countries.

ABOLISH SOME TARIFFS, REGARDLESS OF CANADA.

Now, here is a natural and necessary trade of $55,000,000, and which might be two, three, or four times that amount, hampered and harassed by tariff restrictions, which are of no possible benefit, but, on the contrary, work absolute injury to every interest concerned.

Now, I believe for one—and I intend hereafter to insist upon the belief to the limit of my power—in making a start toward reciprocity by either abolishing or radically reducing the duties on all the articles in this list. If Canada prefers to keep on her more moderate duties, where she levies them, to her own privation, let her do it, but that is a poor reason why we should.

The Home Market Club has finally been forced to concede us coal and iron ore, and William Whitman gives us lumber. Everybody but Col. Clarke wants free hides; and here you have at once accounted for three-quarters in amount of the products under discussion.

In regard to hay, meats, vegetables, fruit, and eggs, I doubt if a government could stand against the demand for a removal of the duties on them, if the people should make this a distinct issue—as they will before long.

In regard to one more prominent item, breadstuffs, it is now fully recognized among those whose opinion is worth anything, that we must either make wheat free, and promptly, too, or prepare to suffer disaster in our milling industries.

As to barley, the outrageous duty upon that and upon the malt made from it is the heaviest burden which our great brewing industries are called upon to bear.

Where can there be any argument or controversy on this great question as I have here presented it?

SOME QUESTIONS FOR THE POLITICIANS.

It is the evident purpose of some of our legislators at Washington to refuse to reduce the tariff on Canadian goods because, as they will say, Canada will make no concessions. This will be the pretext on which they will maintain the status quo.

The only real thought in their minds is to discover the cleverest excuse for standing pat. We understand very well the purpose of these statesmen, and I want to ask some of them who are beginning to profess a tardy love for reciprocity, what they intend to do to show their good faith. They profess to believe in reciprocity in competitive articles. Will they introduce bills lowering our schedules to somewhere near Canada's, or will they prefer to relieve the necessities of the country by direct legislation and place on the free list coal, iron, lumber, wheat, hides, wood pulp, etc.?

This is the practical question we business men purpose to put right up to these politicians until we know exactly where they stand and what they are going to do. We purpose to find out whether those professions made just before election meant anything or not. It is not enough for them to say that they are in favor of reciprocity which will be "mutually advantageous" to both countries. We are willing to concede that the United States should take the initiative. We not only owe it to Canada, in view of her attitude in the past, but we owe it to ourselves as the larger of the two countries, and from the further fact that Canada is our best customer in manufactured goods and our neighbor at that; and from the further overshadowing fact that Canada's commercial policy still remains liberal toward us and gives us such generous access to her markets.

HOW TO MAKE A START.

Now, let us make a start by putting some of these things which we are in desperate need of on the free list, whether Canada reciprocates or not. By so doing we will be not only helping ourselves, but we will be helping Canada to pay a portion of her debt, at least, in commodities instead of cash.

Every business man here knows that treatment of that sort on our part will not conduce to less purchases on the part of Canada. On the contrary, where we are now selling her one hundred and thirty millions we should soon be selling her two hundred millions per annum, if we would only show a disposition to take in payment what she has to offer and what we stand in need of.

Every business man knows that this is the soundest kind of business sense. No one of us ever lost anything yet in trying to help a good customer sell his product. As President Roosevelt said in his Minneapolis speech, "We must also remember that in dealing with other nations, benefits must be given where benefits are sought."

SHALL WE FOLLOW SPAIN AND PORTUGAL?

Both in the United States and in Canada we find those who are no doubt conscientious in their opposition to reciprocity between the two countries. In the United States they are known as the "standpatters," and are represented by the Home Market Club. They represent the ultrahigh-tariff element in the Republican Party. They honestly confuse protection with prohibition.

In Canada they are represented by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. To my mind these two elements propose to do for the United States and Canada practically what Spain and Portugal once did in adopting a policy of selfishness and exclusiveness which, as Hon. John A. Kasson has shown, "other nations would not tolerate, and long-continued wars followed—wars of conquest, which led to the impoverishment of the nations which persisted in their career of international selfishness. Spain and Portugal," continues Mr. Kasson, "once in the forefront of national prosperity and greatness, are now at the rear of the column and apparently without the power of recuperation."

Now, Mr. President, the policy of the Home Market Club and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, carried to its logical conclusion, would bring these two countries to the same end.

From an economic point of view there appears to be every reason why Canada and the United States should come together commercially. We must all admit that the tendency all over the world is toward amalgamation and consolidation, in the interest of economy and the elimination of ruinous competition. We all know that the United States and Canada are competitors in the markets of the world, and are to be so more and more each year as the development of Canada goes on.

COMMERCIAL UNION A NATURAL POLICY.

For instance, Liverpool makes the price for the export wheat, not only of the United States but of Canada. And so of the other exports, whether natural products or manufactures, of both countries. Now, the natural and logical policy for these two contiguous countries is commercial union; an amalgamation, if you please, which will protect the interests of both. If a complete commercial union were possible, it would be the best solution of the whole problem. That is, that trade should be as free and unrestricted between the United States and Canada as it is between the several States of our own country.

This is what I should like to see, for it would mean not only the greatest possible development of both countries in every direction, but it would furthermore insure for all time peace and good will.

IMPROPER SYSTEM OF TAXATION THE BASIC FAULT.

But I recognize that at the present time commercial union may not be practicable from the fact that Canada, like ourselves, has not yet been educated to the principle of direct taxation. When we shall have advanced in civilization to the point where we will not shrink from levying our taxes upon the sources from which they are justly due, and not through class legislation, we can then treat this great business proposition on a business basis. The systems of taxation of the two countries are to-day the only obstacle to the fulfillment of one of the greatest and most beneficent unions in the history of the world. I have faith to believe that before long the people of both countries will remove this artificial barrier to their greatest happiness and prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, the Foss of those days was the Republican of Massachusetts who was crying in the wilderness for the recognition of this doctrine. I do not know whether or not he was driven out of the Republican Party for daring to express these views; but I do know that he became convinced that within the ranks of the Republican Party in Massachusetts there was no opportunity for him to develop this doctrine, and in 1909 he joined hands with the Democrats of Massachusetts, became our candidate for lieutenant governor on the ticket with Hon. James H. Vahey for governor, and the Republican majority of many thousands of previous years was, in the short limits of a six weeks' campaign, cut down to six or eight thousand votes.

I know, too, that in the spring of 1910 he was impressed into service as a Democratic candidate for Congress in the district long represented here until his death by the late Hon. William C. Lovering, and we went into that district and we preached the doctrine of reciprocity with Canada and honest revision of the tariff. And the fourteenth Massachusetts district, that had been sending a Republican Congressman by nearly 15,000 majority, sent here Eugene Noble Foss, a Democrat, by nearly 10,000 majority. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

I know, too, that in the fall of 1910, because of the forceful, businesslike way with which he had presented this and other similar issues to the people of our Commonwealth, he was chosen by the Democrats of the State to be our candidate for governor and was triumphantly elected under most unfavorable Democratic circumstances during the early part of the campaign.

You might say that these victories are entirely personal; you might say that these things mean only that our standard bearer has been a great success as an individual candidate. Let me refer you, then, to the Manual for the General Court of Massachusetts of this year, 1911, where may be found the official votes for Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress in each of our 14 districts. I took time to-day to total the vote for Democratic candidates for Congress as well as the vote for Republican candidates for Congress at the last election in our Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

We have in this Chamber 10 Republican Congressmen from Massachusetts and only four Democratic Members. You might well suppose, as I have learned in conversation with many of you that you really believe, that we are only able to get an occasional victory here and there in our State. But, sir, I find that the total Democratic vote for Congressmen in Massachusetts last fall was 204,639 as against a total Republican vote for Congressmen of 203,136. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when I point out to you that in the ninth district, which I represent and which is the most strongly Democratic district in the State, I not only had to compete with the Republican candidate, but also with an Independent, who had served as a Democrat for eight years in this body, you will readily see that these totals do not altogether tell the story. The fact is that last fall we were at least 10,000 votes stronger on the matter of sending men to this Congress than our Republican brethren, although they have a large majority in the delegation here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I make the point not because of any vainglorious spirit, but simply to show you how Massachusetts stands to-day on current political questions as a result of the campaign made these many years by Eugene N. Foss and Henry M. Whitney and the members of organizations like the New England Reciprocity and Free Trade Leagues. I make the point, too, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may know.

Yes, sir; we did vote for Mr. Foss, and we say that he typifies the permanent spirit of the old Commonwealth, about which the former Speaker seems to be solicitous. I subscribe most heartily to the splendid tribute that he paid to the old State that has done so much in the development of this country, and I say to him he need have no fear that the spirit of that Commonwealth differs to-day from what it has been in the great historic past.

The spirit of Massachusetts yesterday, on the 19th of April, 1911, when he asked his question, was the same spirit that characterized the Minute Men at Concord and Lexington on the 19th of April, 1775. [Applause.] The spirit of Massachusetts yesterday, on the 19th of April, was the same spirit that characterized the men of Massachusetts on the 19th of April, 1861, when they marched through the streets of a then hostile Baltimore and began a long line of brilliant achievements in the great Civil War. [Applause.] The spirit of Massachusetts yesterday, on the 19th of April, was the same, sir, as it was on the 19th of April, 1898, when we started out to fight our War with Spain. [Applause.]

And I believe it is because he so vitally typifies that splendid Massachusetts spirit that Eugene N. Foss was the Democratic Congressman elected from an overwhelmingly Republican district, and is to-day the wise chief executive of a great State in a great Union. [Great applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I regret more than any Democrat in this House can regret the necessity which impels me to make a speech on this subject. I had intended to say nothing on the floor of the House in reference to the Canadian treaty. I had intended to content myself with casting my vote according to my conscience and my duty to my people and no more. But certain recent strictures from my own colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] have made it imperative that we who differ with him should say something with reference to our position in order that our people may know why we are opposed to this measure.

I want to offer my sincere thanks to my good friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for yielding to me the time to address this House. He is in favor of the treaty, but, like the magnanimous gentleman he is, has yielded enough time for me to state my position in order that my fellow Members and my constituents may know why I oppose it.

Mr. Chairman, I have never regarded modern reciprocity as a Democratic doctrine. If I had the time, I believe I could convince any fair-minded Democrat or Republican that it is not Democratic doctrine. I believe that in 1854 reciprocal free trade between the United States and Canada was a Democratic doctrine, but mark you, my friends, the wonderful difference between the reciprocal free-trade agreement between Canada and the United States in 1854 and this so-called reciprocity treaty, which is no more than a revision of the tariff laws between the United States and Canada. Reciprocal free trade of 1854 put practically everything that was produced in the United States and Canada on the free list.

That was genuine reciprocity, fair to both countries and to all the people concerned. In that agreement flour, breadstuffs, bread, meats, coal, and lard, and all of the people's necessities were placed on the free list, which is not so in the present measure, but on such necessities a high protective tariff is left.

That is the last we heard of reciprocity from the Democratic Party until about 40 years afterwards, in 1892. In the meantime, James G. Blaine appeared upon the scene with his modern doctrine of reciprocity, which was like the sample we are now discussing. I do not wonder that my young friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] stands here and sings the praises of reciprocity. It is strictly a New England cult and of New England origin. It was born in that section of the country which has always clamored for cheap or free raw materials which she has to buy and for a high protective tariff on what she manufactures and has to sell. That is why New England to-day is advocating so strongly free trade in farm products and raw material. They are willing to put the other fellow's products on the free list, but whenever you take away some of their protection on what they produce then you will hear them squeal loud and protest much. New England has always had free cotton for her big cotton mills and high protection on her cotton manufactures. She secured free hides two years ago in the Payne bill and held to protection on shoes, and she now hopes to put all other farm products on the free list. Then her selfish plan will be consummated. James G. Blaine is the father of modern reciprocity. He first presented the scheme to Benjamin Harrison in 1890. He urged Mr. Harrison to send his message to Congress in 1890 advocating reciprocity. President Harrison did so, and who was it that introduced the reciprocity provision as part of the Republican tariff law of 1890? None other than Nelson W. Aldrich, highest protectionist, I suppose, that this country ever saw. He was responsible for section 3 of the McKinley Act of 1890, which has ever since been known as the reciprocity provision of that tariff law. When that section was voted on in the Senate my recollection is that every Democrat in that body voted against it, including the two great Senators from North Carolina, Vance and Ransom, while all the Republicans, led by Mr. Aldrich, voted for it.

Under this section 3 various reciprocity agreements or treaties were negotiated by the President. I might say, in passing, that Gen. Grant was for reciprocity, and so was President Arthur, and certain treaties were negotiated by that administration. When Mr. Cleveland came to be President he withdrew them, so much opposed to sham reciprocity was he. In 1892 the Democrats carried this country and elected a Democratic Congress. What happened? At that time, when they met here in Congress on the 4th of March, 1893, various reciprocity treaties were in operation, and when the Wilson-Gorman law was passed those treaties were, ipso facto, repealed by the Democrats. In 1892, 38 years after the real reciprocity treaty with Canada in 1854, the Democrats put in their platform a provision which said that trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored Democratic doctrine; that is, reciprocal free trade between countries, which was the only reciprocity ever theretofore advocated by the Democratic Party, and hence the only kind referred to as being time honored; but here is what our party, in the same clause, said about modern reciprocity, the genus we are now considering:

> We denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges by pretending to establish closer trade relations for a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural products with other countries that are also agricultural, while erecting a customhouse barrier of prohibitive tariff taxes against the richest countries of the world that stand ready to take our entire surplus of products and to exchange therefor commodities which are necessaries and comforts of life among our own people.

Mr. Chairman, I interpret that Democratic declaration as a condemnation of the present treaty, and that is why I say this treaty appears to me to be a sham and a fraud. I quoted that portion of the Democratic platform in a recent published interview for the purpose of showing the party had condemned this kind of treaty, which I consider to be a sham and a fraud and essentially unjust.

When the Democratic Party repealed the reciprocity treaties in 1894 the Republican Party in their platform condemned the Democrats for it. Not only that, but they congratulated themselves on the success of the reciprocity treaties in the following language: "We [the Republican Party] point to the success of the Republican policy of reciprocity." In 1897 various bills were referred to the Ways and Means Committee after the Republicans had regained control of the House, and this book which I hold in my hand contains practically the history of reciprocity legislation in this country. A majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, which was Republican, brought in a report to the House of Representatives in which they stated that the repeal by the Democratic Party of the reciprocity treaties was "a public calamity, and that the policy that they represented shall be permanently adopted in our tariff legislation." Who signed that report? Nelson Dingley, jr., who was the father of the Dingley tariff law that every Democrat in the United States has denounced; Mr. SERENO E. PAYNE, the progenitor of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and who now favors this treaty; Mr. JOHN DALZELL; Albert J. Hopkins; Charles S. Grosvenor; Jonathan P. Dolliver; George W. Steele; Martin Johnson; Walter Evans; and our high-protectionist friend, James A. Tawney. That was the Republican view of modern reciprocity as expressed by the Republican Ways and Means Committee, and that is the view Mr. Taft now seems to take. Now, what did the Democrats on that committee say about reciprocity? Here is what they said in concluding their report:

> We conclude that there is little evidence of any marked benefits flowing from reciprocity agreements. We conclude that uniform rates of duty, applying equally to the products of all nations, is the only safe policy to pursue, as it can give occasion to no complaint of unfair treatment such as must arise under a scheme of discriminating duties.

That minority report was signed by Benton McMillan, of Tennessee, a Democrat who served on the Ways and Means Committee probably longer than any other southern Democrat; Joseph Wheeler, another great Democrat from the South; and H. G. Turner, of Georgia.

It is not fair to other nations to give Canada this advantage while at the same time refusing to give it to other countries. We believe in equal justice to all nations, as well as equal rights to all men. This treaty violates that great principle. The object of free farm products, as found in this Canadian reciprocity, is to give somebody an advantage over somebody else, and this is just as undemocratic and unfair as protection, which is nothing more nor less than giving one class of people an advantage over another class.

I quote from the Democratic campaign handbook of 1902:

> Moreover, such a policy disregards Washington's wise advice and substitutes for this noble rule of conduct the sordid bargains, the unequal and ever-changing discriminations of trade treaties. This great Republic ought to govern its foreign policy by principles of justice and sound economic laws and treat all nations alike. Then it would need no commercial treaties and few political ones.

I say, therefore, that I have never regarded this kind of reciprocity as a Democratic doctrine. I know this treaty is not a Democratic measure, and my Democratic friends on this side will agree that it is not. Is there a Democrat on the floor of the House who will stand up here and say this treaty is Democratic doctrine—a Democratic measure? I have no idea there is. But it is said that it is a slight step, a mere step, in the right direction. My colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]—and I am sorry he is not here—wrote a letter a week or two ago to a personal friend, Mr. McMichael, in our State on this question, and this friend published the letter in a newspaper and I have here a copy of the letter, and in that letter my friend [Mr. KITCHIN] says "that the Canadian reciprocity agreement is a short hobble-skirted step, but still a step." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, ever since that particular kind of feminine dress was introduced into this country I have despised it. I do not like hobble-skirted dresses and I do not like hobble-skirted treaties. [Applause.] And yet my colleague from North Carolina—who made his strenuous effort here Saturday, lasting three hours—I thought, tried to convince the country that this is a simon-pure, genuine-blown-in-the-bottle Democratic measure; and yet he writes to a friend in North Carolina that it is only a "short hobble-skirted step." I noticed a woman walking down the Avenue yesterday who had on a hobble skirt. [Laughter and applause.]

I wanted to see just what distance this treaty carries us in the Democratic direction. Now, mark you, it is not a hobble-skirted step, but it is a "short hobble-skirted step"; and I picked out the tightest-skirted woman I could find [laughter and applause], and while I did not have a policeman's cyclometer to measure the length of each step she took, yet, according to my eyes—and I am a reasonably young man—she did not step more that 6 inches. [Laughter and applause.] I say again that it appeared to me she did not progress more than 6 inches each step; so, if that is the actual distance this treaty is to carry us toward the Democratic goal, it is a ridiculously short one to have so much ado made about it in the Halls of national legislation.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. SIMS. Without the treaty the woman can not even step 6 inches. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, my friend says he would rather take 6 inches than no step at all. The doctrine of de minimis lex non curat—the law does not regard little things—applies here, and the people care nothing for a distance of 6 inches on the long road from a Republican tariff law to a Democratic measure. I am not admitting, however, that it is a 6-inch step in the right direction. I think it several miles in the wrong direction.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman says he measured it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I measured with my eye the distance the woman stepped; but what I am talking about is the infinitesimal distance, according to my colleague, that this treaty carries us toward the goal of Democratic doctrine, and I do not even admit that it is in the direction of Democratic doctrine at all, but I strongly deny it. I say it not only carries us no distance toward Democratic doctrine, but, on the contrary, it is toward Republicanism, for it is a species of reciprocity which Republicans have always advocated since the Civil War, and it was drawn by a Republican Secretary of State, urged upon us by a Republican President of the United States, and advocated by many distinguished Republicans of the House and Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I was first elected to this body in 1902. It was a proud honor the good people of the ninth North Carolina district conferred on me. I carried with me throughout the district in that campaign what most young men think is the regular Democratic Bible, namely, a Democratic campaign handbook. That is where I received my first "larnin," as the darky would say, in reciprocity. And here are some expressions in that handbook. In that year, mark you, the national Democratic congressional committee was composed of Gov. W. W. Kitchin, of North Carolina, Gov. Harmon, Clark Howell, and many other distinguished Democrats, among them my friend from Texas, Mr. RANDELL, who is now a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee. They sent out this handbook, which I hold in my hand, to the voters of the country, that contains these expressions about reciprocity, and, in my opinion, they size up exactly this treaty we are considering:

> Reciprocity looks like free trade, but tastes like protection. It is really a new sugar coating prepared by the Republican tariff doctors for many patients who are refusing to take their protection pills straight.
> In practice reciprocity is worse than protection.
> Our farmers are not sending delegates to Washington to threaten Congress if it does not pass reciprocity legislation. There is nothing in it for farmers. To them it is a sham and a fraud.

And I say, with all the emphasis I am capable of now, that this treaty, as far as the farmer is concerned, is a sham and a fraud. [Applause.]

Reciprocity is based upon the same false theories as is protection, and, like protection, is a sham and a humbug, and to most people has been and will ever continue to be a delusion and a snare.

That expression describes this treaty precisely. All the arguments that have been made in behalf of this measure are to the effect that it will not hurt the farmer. I have not heard any Member argue that it will help the farmer, but before I get through I will point out how the big manufacturers and trusts of this country are going to be benefited and how it appears to me that the farmers' interests are being traded off for the benefit of the big trusts and manufacturers of the United States.

Another expression from the handbook:

Reciprocity is put forward to save protection and to stave off the demand for genuine tariff revision.

I say that when Mr. Taft sent this reciprocity bill to Congress, in January, on the eve of the assembling of the Democratic Congress, it was sent here, it seems to me, for the purpose of embarrassing the Democratic Congress; and I say here now, with no idea of being contradicted, that it has embarrassed us. It has embarrassed you, and you, and you, and a hundred, probably, of good Democrats of this Congress. Many Democrats are going to vote for it who do not want to do so. I do not like President-made laws, anyway. The people of the United States pay Congressmen about $4,000,000 a year to make laws. This is exclusively the function of Congress under the Constitution, and it is the duty of the President to execute those laws when so made; but this tariff-law treaty was made by the President and his Secretary of State and sent to Congress for our ratification, with a careful warning that the people's elected representatives must not change it, even to dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." This is usurping the duties of a great lawmaking body, and I object to it seriously.

Daniel Webster once said:

The contest of the ages has been to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power.

The Chief Executive, Mr. Taft, not only directed the making of this treaty law, but is now actively using all his tremendous influence and power to have it ratified by Congress.

James G. Blaine said that reciprocity was the handmaid of protection, and I could quote on and on from leading Republican authority, Mr. Chairman, if the clock did not warn me that my time is fast running away. Here are the Republican platform declarations in 1896 in reference to reciprocity:

We believe that the repeal (by the Democrats) of the reciprocity arrangements negotiated by the last Republican administration was a national calamity. * * * Protection and reciprocity are twin measures of Republican policy, and go hand in hand. Democratic rule has recklessly struck down both, and both must be reestablished.

Hon. E. J. HILL, a distinguished Republican Member of this body and who is thoroughly versed in the history of his party, in a speech a few days ago, fervently advocating this treaty, said on the floor of the House that the treaty "is in full accord with the practice of the Republican Party in the past and also with the provisions of the national Republican platform at the present time, and that it (the treaty) squares with the Republican doctrine of protection."

My Democratic colleagues, we were elected last fall in a tariff-revision-campaign fight, and I declare to you that it does not set well on me to have us assemble here in extra session and begin our cuttings and revisions, begin our tariff reductions by placing all Canadian farm products in free competition with our own farmers—the tillers of the soil—whose labors feed the world and whose chivalry and bravery have fought all the battles this country has won. [Applause.] The little tariff on farm products hurts no one, yet the first gun is aimed at him. There are glaring, monstrous inequalities in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill that we might attack first and foremost; but, no; they are left for another day, and we are led by the President to an attack on the little tariff there is on the farmer's products and induced by him to place all he produces on the free list.

Mr. Chairman, there are four or five different classes of advocates of this reciprocity treaty, it seems to me, and the first of these advocated which I shall mention are those who believe in the annexation of Canada to the United States. Among that distinguished class I would place my Republican friend from Connecticut, Mr. EBENEZER J. HILL. And there are others, not only on the floor of this House, but all over this country who want this trade-treaty agreement with Canada, thinking that it will bring about annexation finally. For my part, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to annexing Canada. Fisher Ames once said that "this country is big enough." And it is too big now. Continental United States is capable of sustaining a thousand million souls, and then our country would not be as thickly settled as Massachusetts is to-day. Continental United States could sustain every human being in the entire world, and then our population would be no more dense than Belgium's. We have enough territory at present; we do not need any more.

Mr. POU. Or the Philippines.

Mr. WEBB. No; I would like to swap them off or give them away. I fear they will be a source of unending trouble.

In addition to this there is a large proportion of Canadians of the Latin race, and it is an historical fact that no Latin race has ever accepted a republican form of government with any staying fidelity. They are natural monarchists; they will always look to a king and to the monarchy. There is no reason why we should annex Canada. We do not need her, and there is no reason, in my mind, for giving Canada an advantage, as we do in this treaty, over other friendly nations. Why should we not give to the people of England, our Anglo-Saxon brethren, the same privileges and benefits as we extend to this mixed population in Canada?

There is another class of men advocating this treaty who believe in what is known as the doctrine of free raw material, with a revenue tariff or a protective tariff on all manufactured articles. For my part I do not believe in this doctrine. I believe in the doctrine of that great statesman, Robert J. Walker, the father of our tariff faith, who worked out a policy which, if steadily pursued, would have put us as a party in power more often in the past and would carry us into power more surely in the future; who believed in putting a tariff on practically everything that is imported, whether raw material or manufactured articles, making the tariff low according to the necessity of the article and high in proportion to its luxury, so that if a tariff is a blessing everybody shares it, and if it is a burden everybody bears it.

My Democratic friends, when you abandon that doctrine and go to substituting for it the doctrine of putting a lot of products on the free list that men produce in this country, then there is no end to the possible free list, and the ultimate extreme to which you are driven is free trade. And I conceive that, under the Constitution that we have lived by and have loved for 120 years, and under which we live to-day, that so long as that Constitution exists in its present form we are compelled to levy a tariff tax in order to raise revenue to run the Government.

I look upon the tariff as a tax, and therefore I would make that tariff fall equally and justly and impartially upon the shoulders of all our people, not giving to some men the right to buy in the cheapest market and sell their products in the highest market and compelling some to sell their products in the cheapest market and buy in the dearest, because that is unfair and unjust. Whenever you create a long free list and retain a long protected list you thereby give to some an advantage over others. If you put all raw material on the free list, you give the manufacturer a double advantage, an advantage at both ends—the right to buy in the cheapest market and the privilege of selling in the highest market. I believe in the historic Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue, so levied as to make the burdens of the tax fall equally and justly upon all.

Mr. Chairman, there is still another class advocating the treaty, and that class consists of those extreme free traders who are willing to swallow the big protection hook that is hidden in this treaty in order to get the free-trade bait. My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], I believe, said in his speech that he was a free trader. Now, free trade is a Utopian dream at present. The Constitution will have to be amended materially before we can adopt free trade. We are now legislating under conditions that actually exist and not under those that may be hoped for. Every Democrat and every Republican knows that as long as we have to raise $350,000,000 annually by import duties we are compelled to levy a tariff tax. Therefore in levying the tariff tax we should levy it on practically everything and give no one an advantage over anybody else, and not give to some the right to buy their goods from a free list and require that others must buy protected articles. That would be taxing some and letting others escape taxation altogether. That would be as unfair as taxing all farm lands and letting city property escape altogether.

There is still another class, and that class is composed of those who favor this treaty from purely selfish motives. Gentlemen, all life nowadays seems to be selfish. You can scarcely go about the streets of this city, you can scarcely move anywhere, without seeing selfishness stick up its ugly head.

And I tell you, my friends, I believe that selfishness and privilege and advantage are doing more to ram this treaty through Congress than any other single cause. Selfishness? Yes. Where is the man who will deny that the great metropolitan newspapers in the United States to-day who are advocating this treaty, many of them because they expect to get free wood pulp and print paper, are actuated by pure and unadulterated selfishness? I declare unto you, my friends, and unto them, that the great newspapers of this country are no more entitled to free wood pulp and print paper than is the poor toiler on the farm in my country and the poor laborer entitled to free woolen clothes or free sugar. And yet you will not think for a moment of putting these necessities of all the people, poor as well as rich, on the free list. If not, why not? They are as much entitled to cheap sugar and cheap clothes as the newspapers are entitled to cheap paper. Yes, we have many of the great city newspapers back of this treaty because there is a big saving in it to them by taking the tax off their print paper. There is no promise on their part to reduce the price of the paper to their readers or the cost of advertising space, but they see cheaper print paper and therefore bigger profits if the treaty passes. I do not blame them. This is such a selfish world that every man has to look out for self, just as many of the big newspapers are doing in supporting this treaty.

There is still another class of individuals who are supporting this treaty for selfish purposes. I am going to charge, and do charge, that the United States Steel Corporation, the biggest trust in the world, organized by J. Pierpont Morgan, the wizard of finance, who received $100,000,000 for organizing it, favors this treaty and is helping to pass it. I make the charge that that great corporation is advocating this treaty. I call upon my friends from Pennsylvania, the whole congressional delegation, many of whom I see before me, to deny that all the steel corporations in Pennsylvania are backing this treaty to-day and are advocating it. Why are they advocating it? I will show you a little later that it is because they are getting a big advantage in it. In the treaty Canada reduces her tariff barrier against United States iron and steel manufactures, which are exported to Canada, and as a quid pro quo Canada induces us to reduce our tariff barrier against her farm products in order that she may export them into the United States with greater ease and at bigger profits to her farmers.

The General Electric Co. wants this treaty ratified. This company is controlled and owned by J. P. Morgan and John D. Rockefeller, and is probably the closest trust in America, because many of its trust advantages are based upon patents. Why are they for it? They have to use a great deal of mica in the manufacture of electrical machinery and appliances. They get their mica duty free under this treaty, although mica has never before been placed on the free list since it was discovered in the United States. It was put on the dutiable list in the tariff law of 1890; it was put on the dutiable list in the Democratic tariff law of 1894; it was put on the dutiable list in all the other tariff bills since that time. Zeb Vance, the great commoner from North Carolina, one of the best-loved men that ever sat in the Senate of the United States from my country, assented to a duty on mica; Gov. Jarvis, that noble old Roman from North Carolina, Matt Ransom, who defended our State in war and peace, John T. Morgan, of Alabama, Senator Vilas, and other great Democrats voted for a duty on mica, and where their footsteps lead I gladly follow. This treaty puts mica absolutely on the free list and allows Morgan's trust to buy it from Canada without any tax, while retaining the same high Payne-Aldrich tariff rates on all of the trust's finished products, electrical machinery, which people everywhere are compelled to buy at the same extortionate prices.

Mr. PALMER. Where is mica mostly produced in this country?

Mr. WEBB. It is produced in North Carolina and in Mr. WEBB's district. [Applause.] If the trusts are fighting for their interests in the treaty, I shall not forget my people in the fight, for I have never gotten any bigger than the people of my district. [Applause.] It is contrary to human nature to get too big to represent your own folks, they who love and honor you, and whenever any man gets too big to do so, he ought to be put out of Congress. That is the doctrine that Zeb. Vance laid down away back more than 20 years ago when twitted about the tariff on mica, and I reiterate it here to-day, and when I get too big to represent the interests of my district I hope my people will beat me. I need not express the hope, for I know they will do it. [Applause.]

There is another group of interests back of this treaty, known as the Hill railroad interests. James J. Hill said in an interview that he did not see how a man with any sense could oppose it, or something to that effect. That was selfishness again speaking. Mr. Hill's railroads run into Canada and the United States, back and forth, and he wants to increase the trade between the two countries in order that dividends on his railroad stock may be enhanced and more money put into his pocket. Oh, yes; Mr. Hill, with all his power and influence, controlling about 30,000 miles of railroad, enough to girdle the earth, is advocating the treaty, and we can easily understand his interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. WEBB. May I have 15 minutes more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should be glad to give that time to the gentleman, but I have not got it. I will yield him ten, and that is all I have to my credit.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield the gentleman 15 minutes, and we will have to run a little longer.

Mr. WEBB. I thank the gentleman very much. I realize that I am speaking under high pressure, because I have to put two hours' talk into 40 minutes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another class of citizens anxious to have the treaty passed, who, I believe, are deceived as to its effect on the cost of living, and that is the big-city dwellers. If every Member of this body were left to vote on this question without caucus action or other influence, I believe it would be the first time in the history of the United States that the big cities would be arrayed against the country districts. I believe the rural districts would vote against the treaty and the cities would vote for it, because the "interests" and many big dailies have put it into their heads that the cost of living is going to be reduced; and yet advocates of the treaty on this floor tell us that it will not affect the cost of living, for they know if they do so argue it is bound to be reduced at the cost of the farmer, and this they do not want the farmer to believe. If the framers of the treaty really wanted to reduce the cost of living, instead of taking the duty off wheat alone they would also have taken it off flour, too. The laboring man can not eat wheat, but he can eat flour. Wheat is put on the free list, while flour is taxed. And yet they leave the duty on flour instead of taking it off, and thus tax the people's bread. Then instead of taking the duty off cattle they would have taken it off meat also. You can not eat a steer, but you can eat beef. The man who drew the treaty, a former employee of the Steel Trust, left beef on the protected list at a cent and a quarter a pound, which will enable the Beef Trust to collect a royalty of more than a cent a pound on all beef the poor man carries home in his tired hands. Let me point out how the Beef Trust shows its fine hand in the making of this treaty. Cattle, the Beef Trust's raw material, are put on the free list, so that thousands can be driven across the Canadian border or shipped on the Hill railroads into the United States to be sold to the trust at the lowest competitive prices; but after the cattle are converted into meat, see what a tight grip the trust holds on the consumer. It generously consents to a reduction of one-fourth of a cent a pound tax on dressed meats coming into the United States, which is prohibitive and will keep out all Canadian competition in this great article of food, for last year Canada only sold the United States $84,000 worth of meats and lard; but this is not all. The friends of the trust induce Canada to reduce her tariff against American meats and lard three-fourths of a cent a pound on lard, and on meats 1¾ cents per pound, while last year the trust sold Canada 10,000,000 pounds of lard and large quantities of fresh meats, all aggregating—that is, lard and meats—$2,400,000 worth. Therefore the treaty keeps out of the United States trust competition in meats and lard and makes the Canadian market easier and freer for the trust.

If you want sincerely to reduce the cost of living, put things that men eat on the free list—meat and bread. This treaty will give the trust cheaper cattle and wheat, but continues the power of the trusts to rob the people, as heretofore, on flour and meat and bread.

I take the position that the treaty is unjust to the farmer. I said this when I first read it, and I am more firmly convinced now than ever that it is an injustice to him. In fact, the Ways and Means Committee have this morning brought from the press their report on the free-list bill which we will be called to vote upon pretty soon and which I wanted to make a part of this treaty as section 2, and in that report they admit that it is an injustice to the farming class of this country. I want to read you briefly an extract from that report:

In fact, action on the Canadian agreement involves the necessity of further and immediate action in removing a number of duties on imports from other countries, in order that justice may be done to the great army of our great agricultural producers, who in the Canadian agreement are to have all the alleged protection removed from their products without a corresponding or reciprocal removal of the protective duties most burdensome on the commodities they must purchase as necessary to sustain their lives and industries.

Now, gentlemen, I declare unto you that this is an admission by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], Mr. KITCHIN, and the other Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee that this treaty, which is nothing but a new tariff law between us and Canada, is an injustice to the farmers of this country. I take the position that it is unjust, for the reason that all of the farmers' products are put absolutely on the free list, while the Canadian farmers now sell to the United States, even with the present tariff tax against them, more than our farmers export to Canada. However, of the manufactured products the reverse is true, and our exports into Canada are a thousand fold more than Canada sends into the United States, making the market for American manufactured articles easier, but making the competitive struggle of the American farmer with Canada fiercer.

The treaty places practically all agricultural products on the free list, thereby giving the large manufacturers and trusts of the country the right to buy farm products at the lowest price and compel the farmers to pay the manufacturers for finished products the highest price. The Republican Party for 40 years has maintained a system of tariff taxes which has enabled manufacturers to charge our people not only the world price for their manufactured articles, but the world price plus the tariff, while on the other hand the toiling farmer of the country, who has been producing more than our home market could consume and therefore shipping much abroad, has been compelled to receive only the world price for the product of his toil. Naturally they have not shared in the legislative-made prosperity, and many of the farmers and farmers' boys during the last two decades, feeling the inequality in the race for the accumulation of anything in life, have left the farms and gone to the cities and manufacturing centers where they might enjoy some of the artificial tariff profits.

This movement has drained the farms of splendid laborers until now the time has arrived when the farmers' products have not kept pace with the increasing population, and therefore our exports of farm products are smaller, and necessarily the price of our farm products has risen during the last few years and the farmer has been getting fairer prices. But now what do we behold? These great tariff-made barons and millionaire manufacturers are not willing that the farmer should receive an increased price for his products, and so in order to hold him down and compel him to accept the world price for his goods they propose to turn all the farm products of that great Dominion to the north of us into the United States to compete with every farmer that earns his living by the sweat of his face, and compel him to work harder and remain poorer than the tariff-protected industries of the country which have fattened at his expense.

Former Gov. Bachelder, of New Hampshire, now master of the National Grange, composed of 6,000,000 farmers, said that these 6,000,000 farmers were united in opposition to this treaty, and said he voiced this protest against free trade in farm products while protection was continued on manufactured articles, which the farmers were compelled to buy.

It has been truly said:

The farmer is the progenitor of the human race, and was the first to stand in the presence of the Creator to receive from him the decree of the Divine mind on the question of labor.

Mr. Chairman, all human progress and prosperity depend upon his industry and success, and our mighty commercial fabric, which dazzles the whole world, rests upon his broad back. All of the splendid ships sailing all the seas and docking at all the ports of earth are absolutely dependent on the corn fields, wheat fields, and cotton fields of the farmer. Without his industry and prosperity the railroad irons of our great national highways would soon turn to rust and the scream of the locomotive would soon become a strange noise in the land. Were it not for the humble tiller of the soil the owls and bats would infest the lofty spires of our magnificent cities, and they would soon fall to ruins as complete as those of Herculaneum or Pompeii.

The President of the North Carolina Farmers' Union thinks this treaty unfair and unjust to the farmer. He is one of the most intelligent and fair-minded men in that great State, and after careful study of the treaty here is what Dr. H. Q. Alexander, president of this great organization, says:

I approve of your course in opposing the reciprocity treaty with Canada as it was presented to the House by the President. That treaty is not fair or just. It seeks to lower the cost of living, but taxes the farmer with the reduction without in any way compensating him for his loss. And I am not sure that it would even lower the cost of food products to the consumer. All articles put on the free list are in the raw state. No manufactured products are admitted free. The farmers and laborers produce the raw materials. Capital converts it into the finished product. Capital is protected. The man must fight unaided for his living. The dollar is placed above the man.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer does not demand any special privileges, but he demands equal justice. This he is entitled to and with nothing less will he be satisfied.

Lands are undoubtedly cheaper in Canada, hence taxes are lower, and the Canadian farmers' cost of living is cheaper than to our farmers, for the Canadian pays a lower tariff tax on his necessities. The following table shows this:

Article.	Tariff paid by Canadian farmer.	Tariff paid by American farmer.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Tinware	15	45
Hats	20	55
Sugar	35	80
Hose	25	87

Thus the Canadian farmer can produce farm products cheaper than our farmers, for his burdens are lighter, expenses less, and this treaty throws our farmers absolutely into the unequal struggle for competition with his Canadian rival. The treaty places on the free list, which will reduce our revenue about $5,000,000, something like 54 articles produced on the farm, including wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, butter, eggs, and so forth, while the Democratic Walker tariff law placed a tariff on all the farmer's products as well as on the manufacturer's; the Wilson-Gorman Democratic tariff law of 1894 did the same thing.

My friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] yesterday spoke in glowing terms of the fact that barbed wire was put on the free list in the treaty. Oh, my friends, what a ridiculous proposition! Does anyone think the farmer can be thus fooled? We have not imported a pound of barbed wire from Canada since it became a province of England; but we do export into Canada about a million dollars' worth a year. Now they take the tariff off barbed wire in order that it may come into the United States from Canada to compete with the Steel Trust in the farmers' interest. The only barbed-wire manufactory in Canada is a subsidiary corporation belonging to the United States Steel Trust. Now, when you have the United States Steel Trust in Canada competing with the United States Steel Trust in the United States will it not be a glorious competition and will not the price fall rapidly? This is a joke. To mention it is to laugh.

Yes; the Coal Trust gets in its work, too. The duty on coal going into Canada is 53 cents a ton. This treaty reduces the duty on coal going into Canada from 53 to 45 cents a ton, but keeps the same strangle hold on the people on all coal coming into the United States by retaining the Payne-Aldrich duty. The Coal Trust, of course, wants the treaty because it is giving easier access to Canadian markets, but keeps the same exclusive tariff on all coal coming into the United States; and the price of coal will not be reduced to our people. Canada shipped only $512,000 worth of coal last year to the United States, while the United States Coal Trust sold into Canada $11,000,000 worth. This treaty keeps out material competition with the trust, but makes the Canadian market easier and freer for the trust.

Let us take up the Agricultural Implement Trust. That trust has had the people of the United States by the throat, especially the farmers, for years. It gets the lion's share in this treaty. Plows, hoes, rakes, diggers, thrashing machines, drills, and all sorts of agricultural implements are going into Canada hereafter, when this treaty is passed, at a reduced Canadian rate. The ordinary Canadian rate against agricultural implements is from 25 to 17½ per cent. This treaty reduces the Canadian tariff against agricultural implements down to 15 per cent. Therefore, the Agricultural Implement Trust will sell more of these articles to Canada and reap bigger profits.

But, mark you, the treaty gives this trust the same Payne-Aldrich protective duty on all agricultural implements coming into the United States, so as to insure the old-time robbery of our farmers. Our entire purchases from Canada of agricultural implements during the year 1910 were only $74,000, if this book which I hold in my hand is correct, while the trust sold to Canada $2,230,000 worth of agricultural implements in that year, and this treaty simply makes the Canadian market larger and freer to that trust by lowering the Canadian tariff wall, but enables the Agricultural Implement Trust to rob the American farmer as it has in the past.

The Cement Trust was remembered, too, when this treaty was being framed, you might say, in secret, for the public and all Congress was kept in ignorance of it until it was ready to be sent to us, with orders that it must not be amended in the slightest particular, but that it must go through Congress with a hop, skip, and a jump or a dire extra session would be called. Well, the Cement Trust induces Canada to reduce her tariff on cement 1½ cents per hundred pounds, but the obliging treaty makers were careful not to lower the protective duty on cement coming into the United States, but kept the same Payne-Aldrich rate on it. So cement will sell no cheaper to our people, but the trust gets an easier market in Canada.

In the few remaining moments that I have I desire to make a personal explanation. Last Saturday my friend and colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], against whom I have no unkind feeling and with whom the most cordial relations exist, delivered somewhat of a lecture to those of us who could not see the situation as he does. He said that we were in mighty bad company, and even suggested that Mr. DALZELL had actually come over and influenced or fooled—I have not seen his speech, for it has not yet been published, and do not recall his exact words—the North Carolina Democrats in Congress, six of whom are against the treaty. Now, my friend Mr. KITCHIN did not mean that. He could not have meant it, and yet it has gone over my State that he said it. I do not have any idea that he meant that Mr. DALZELL could corrupt Mr. GUDGER, or Mr. PAGE, or Mr. POU, or Mr. DOUGHTON, or Dr. FAISON, or myself, or anybody else from North Carolina. However, so far as the company is concerned, in view of the gentleman's present companions in support of this treaty, I must conclude that even Mr. JOHN DALZELL is pretty fair company, because it has not been two months ago since we had up what is known as the tariff commission board bill, and when the vote was taken on the measure I find my good friend, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, the Democratic Speaker, and Mr. OSCAR UNDERWOOD, the present Democratic floor leader, broke away from Mr. KITCHIN and voted with Mr. JOHN DALZELL. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DALZELL did not corrupt or fool Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. CLARK; of course not. That kind of reasoning on the part of my colleague is not argument, but it is a species of an attempt to prejudice people's minds, and if I were as gifted in that sort of suggestion as my friend Mr. KITCHIN is, I would say that he is in rather bad political company, too, because around him stand the progenitor of the Payne-Aldrich bill, Mr. PAYNE, and our friend Nelson W. Aldrich is very anxious to have this treaty passed. The horrible Aldrich is for the treaty and so is Mr. KITCHIN. [Laughter.] The Steel Trust is for the treaty and so is Mr. KITCHIN. Andrew Carnegie, who boasts that he has made 43 millionaires in his lifetime and who is afraid that he will die rich, so much money has he made off the people, is for the treaty, too. The Beef Trust is for the treaty and so is Mr. KITCHIN. The Cement Trust wants it, too. Judge CRUMPACKER, who has always ardently favored cutting down southern representation in Congress on account of the Negro vote, is for the treaty, and Mr. KITCHIN is going to vote with him. The Agricultural Implement Trust is bending every energy to have the treaty passed and so is Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who wields more power and influence than any throned monarch and whose financial will Presidents of the United States dare not contrary, supports the treaty. In that bouquet of great financial wizards, powerful, heartless trusts, and high-protection Republicans my friend KITCHIN at present finds himself safely ensconced as the central flower. [Laughter and applause.]

He twits me because I am not willing that mica should go on the free list. Here again I refer to my former statement. Yes; mica is produced in North Carolina, in the mountains of my good State and district. Many poor people up there are paying the Steel Trust a high tariff tax on their picks, axes, and shovels with which they dig out this mineral, and are selling it for the best price that monopolistic buyers will pay them. Now comes along this treaty, this new tariff law, framed by friends of the great trusts, and places mica on the free list, although mica is the best revenue producer in all the list in comparison with the amount produced in the United States and imported. Why, in 1907 there was paid $435,000 duty on mica. Now a large portion of this revenue will be destroyed and remitted to the trust, and the taxes will be increased on the necessities of the poor in order to make up this loss of revenue. He stated that if you scratched a little deeper into my position on the treaty you would find mica. No; you do not have to scratch to find where I am on any question.

I told my fellow Democrats in the caucus that last fall when my people in the mountains wanted to know how I stood on the tariff and mica that I said to them that I would not promise that I would not vote for a reduction of the duty on mica, but being a Democrat and believing in a tariff for revenue, as the fathers of our party believed, and as there had always been a duty on mica, and since the Wilson-Gorman Democratic tariff law put a tariff on mica, that in view of this record of my party that I would not vote to put that article on the free list, and, my friends, I am not going to do it. [Applause.] Certainly not at the behest of a trust and a Republican administration. The caucus at once excused me from voting for the treaty.

Now, my friends, I do not care to be personal, but if I had the gift of innuendo and was willing to use it against political friend and foe as my colleague did in his long speech on Saturday, I might say that if you will scratch a little deeper under his advocacy of this treaty you might find peanuts.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the fact that Mr. KITCHIN is out of the Chamber.

Mr. WEBB. I am very sorry he is not present. I did not know when I was to speak; if I had, I would have notified Mr. KITCHIN; but, after all, Mr. Chairman, I am saying no more about my colleague than he said about me. I understood from a colleague that he would be here to-day. This hour is the only time I could get to speak, and I must avail myself of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say I am sorry that my friend and colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is not here. There is no feeling between him and myself. We married in the same town, we attended the same church, graduated from the same institution, belonged to the same college society, are members of the same church and affiliate with the same political party, so there is absolutely no feeling between us. [Laughter.] I am only replying to him in kind and in the kindest way, and as he suggested mica as the moving cause for my position on this treaty, I would suggest that my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has a large peanut-growing district. More peanuts are produced in his district, possibly, than in any district in the United States. Now, I do not insinuate that a little thing like a peanut would influence a great big man like my friend KITCHIN. [Laughter.] But it is a fact that Canada now levies a tax of 3 cents per pound on imported shelled peanuts and 2 cents a pound on unshelled peanuts, and by this treaty Canada is to reduce the duty on peanuts 75 per cent, and it should be remembered that she is the greatest purchaser of American peanuts. But, mark you, the duty of 19½ per cent protection on peanuts coming into the United States is retained in the treaty, which is the Payne-Aldrich protection duty.

Mr. KITCHIN says, in the McMichael letter, that the treaty will enlarge the peanut market and not hurt United States peanuts, because Canada produces none.

I do not say that this fact is the moving cause behind my colleague's zeal for the treaty, but I do say that it seems to me to be a little unfair for him to accept a protective tariff of 19½ per cent on his peanuts and then use every effort to take all the tariff off mica produced in my district and place it on the free list. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to even up the time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we in the State of California are somewhat familiar with the subject of reciprocity. We know from actual experience how detrimental reciprocity treaties are to home industry. We are protectionists in that State, for the doctrine of protection as applied to the products of our State has brought great material prosperity to that Commonwealth.

I was an insurgent in this House in the Fifty-seventh Congress when Cuban reciprocity was before it. At that time Cuba was producing about 600,000 long tons of sugar per annum. The beet-sugar industry in this country, and especially in the State of California, was an important and a growing one. We felt that if Cuban reciprocity should be enacted into law it would materially injure the beet-sugar industry in that State. But Cuban reciprocity was enacted, and in 1910 1,800,000 long tons of sugar were produced in Cuba, much of it controlled by the Sugar Trust. The cost of sugar to the consumer has not been reduced a fraction of a cent, and the 20 per cent reduction on Cuban sugar under the Cuban reciprocity bill, which, according to the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] on this floor the other day, amounts in all to about $77,000,000 up to the present time, has practically gone into the pockets of the Sugar Trust. The people of the United States as consumers have not profited a single cent as the result of Cuban reciprocity.

Some years before that the Hawaiian Islands entered into a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and sugar came free from those islands. The consumer did not get the fraction of a cent benefit, but a half dozen men became multimillionaires. They, and they alone, were the beneficiaries under Hawaiian reciprocity. So that we have had actual experiences that ought to have taught the American people a lesson on the subject of reciprocity agreements. During the McKinley administration some half dozen reciprocity treaties were negotiated with as many countries, and those treaties were sent to the Senate for ratification. They were negotiated by Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, on behalf of the United States. Every one of them contemplated the reduction of duty on some product of California, and the Californians in this House and in the Senate fought with all their might to prevent the ratification of those treaties. We helped to defeat them, and the people of California applauded our course. And I feel to-day that every other State in the Union is equally entitled to that measure of protection for its industries that those industries may require. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I was rather entertained the other day when this reciprocity question came up on the floor of this House by the colloquy that occurred between the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and some of my Republican friends on this side of the Chamber who are opposed to the pending measure. It seems to me that some of my Republican brethren are not altogether consistent. They want to put wheat on a pedestal because it happens to be the product of their particular section of our country, but they are willing to sacrifice the industries of other sections, which said industries probably require protection just as much as does wheat. I believe that the industries of every section of this country, if they require protection, should be protected. I do not believe that because my district happens to produce something that requires protection that that commodity should be protected and that the duties on products of other districts should be lowered simply because my constituents have to purchase those commodities. That kind of near protection—"mercerized protection," if you please—does not appeal to me. Either the protection principle is right or it is wrong. I believe it to be right, and in my humble judgment it must either stand or fall as a principle and in its entirety.

The bill now before this House materially affects some of our industries in the West. We have in California a comparatively new one, an infant industry in the true sense of the word, one that has been built up within the last three or four years, the industry of manufacturing whale oil. Under this bill whale oil will be admitted from Canada absolutely free. Under the Payne bill it pays 8 cents a gallon duty. Whale oil is used largely in the manufacture of soap. Now, the ships that are engaged in that industry in the State of California are built in American shipyards. They cost about $80,000 apiece. The Canadian ships, on the other hand, are built in Norwegian shipyards, and they cost about $23,000 apiece. The crews that man the American ships get wages of about $75 a month per man, and the owners of the vessels have to feed the men. It is claimed that the expense of feeding the men is about $1 per day per man. The crews on the Canadian ships get about $40 a month per man, and they feed themselves, because they are principally Chinese and Japanese.

On the other hand, the men on the American ships are principally American citizens. Besides, the harpoons, bombs, and other paraphernalia used in this industry are manufactured abroad, and when brought into this country pay a duty to our Government. On the other hand, the same kind of implements brought into Canada for use on Canadian whaling vessels pay either a much lower duty or none at all. If this bill should pass, either the industry will be destroyed, so far as the United States end of it is concerned, or those engaged in the industry in this country will have to hie themselves to Canada, put their vessels under the Canadian flag, and thus give another blow to the American merchant marine.

The following letters set out the situation regarding the whale-oil industry quite fully:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO,
San Francisco, April 3, 1911.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
2712 Webster Street, San Francisco.

SIR: The inclosed copy of a letter received by this chamber from the Barneson-Hibberd Co., protesting against the enactment of the legislation which will permit the free entry from Canada of whale oil into the the United States, has received the unanimous indorsement of the board of trustees, and by their direction it is referred to you for your favorable and courteous consideration.

Yours, very truly, C. W. BURKS, Secretary.

BARNESON-HIBBERD CO., (INC.),
149 CALIFORNIA STREET,
San Francisco, Cal., March 31, 1911.

Capt. WILLIAM MATSON,
President Chamber of Commerce,
San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: We desire to invite your attention to a clause in the reciprocity act with Canada which, if passed, will permit of the importation of whale oil into the United States of America free of duty.

At the present time there is a duty of 8 cents per gallon on this article, and, as we are manufacturers of whale oil, we desire to obtain the assistance of your honorable body in an endeavor to have this article stricken out of the reciprocity act, for the following reasons:

We have invested up to this time the sum of $400,000 in steamers and plant in southeastern Alaska, which includes our two whalers. Our annual cost of operation is $150,000, all of which money is spent in San Francisco and on Puget Sound. To build boats for the purpose of this work we are compelled, under the laws of this country, to have them constructed in the shipyards of the United States, where they cost us $80,000 fully equipped for the purpose of whaling. At our station we pay a wage of 25 cents an hour and board to from 75 to 100 employees during the season.

On the west coast of Vancouver Island there are situated three whaling stations in operation, and at this time these people are building three more stations. They have just brought out from Norway 5 Norwegian-built whalers, making a total of 12 boats, which they will operate this season, and, we understand, plans are already drawn for more boats for next season. These boats cost them in the neighborhood of about £4,000 in Norway, or $20,000 American money. To operate their stations they employ Japanese and Chinese coolies, to whom they pay a wage of about $40 per month, these men boarding themselves, as against our cost of $75 per month and board, which amounts to $1 per day per man. Their expense of operating their steamers is also one-half of what it costs us to operate our boats.

At the time we formed the company for operating this whaling industry we went into the matter carefully, and while we fully realized the vast difference in the cost of operation on the American side, as compared to that on the British side, we concluded that the 8 cents per gallon duty on this product protected us enough so that we could make a success of the business. Should this duty be removed we will be powerless to operate in face of the competition of our opponents on the British side, and it will result in the total loss of our investment.

In addition to the above we invite your attention to the fact that we are compelled to use the Norwegian hemp line for our whaling and also Norwegian harpoons, guns, etc., on all of which class of goods we are compelled to pay a heavy bounty when bringing them into the country.

The Tyee Co. are the pioneers for making this class of whale oil in the United States, and in addition were compelled to create their own market.

When this company first commenced to manufacture this product we we not able to sell a single barrel in the United States, and were forced to send our output to Glasgow, where it was sold at a heavy loss.

In competition with the product of the cheaply operated foreign plants, as we have only 2 steamers against 12 of our competitors, you can readily see there is not much chance for this infant industry if it is not afforded this protection, particularly as at the present time the American markets are not taking care of our whole production.

We have gradually educated the consumers of America to the fact that they can use this product for the manufacture of soap, and at the present time the different soap manufacturers, both on the Pacific coast and Atlantic seaboard, are using the greater part of our output, but still making it necessary for us to dispose of a portion of our output in the foreign market at a loss.

Our annual output is about 10,000 barrels, on which the duty is $36,000. This amount represents more than our season's profit for the work of the entire plant, which is an investment of $400,000. If this duty is withdrawn, we will not only lose the profit, but our markets will be invaded by several times that amount of oil from British Columbia, and the value of our plant will thereby be entirely destroyed, as the markets at the present time will not take up all of our output; and if our competitors, with their cheap production, are allowed to come in and compete with us they will be able to drive us entirely out of business and destroy the value of our plant.

In view of the foregoing facts we respectfully ask that your body take prompt action to protest against the admission of whale oil into the United States from Canada free of duty.

We operate our whaling industry under the name of The Tyee Co.

Yours, respectfully,

BARNESON-HIBBERD CO.,
I. N. HIBBERD, Vice President.

Take the paper industry, and in that very connection let me call your attention to that feature of the Republican platform that has been so often referred to on this floor, that the measure of protection should be the difference between the cost of production here and abroad plus a reasonable profit. The report of the Tariff Commission, submitted by the President to the Senate on February 28, 1911, shows that as to news print paper alone in various sections of this country there is a variation in the cost of production of $14.19 a ton. In other words, news print paper can be manufactured in some sections of our country at $14 a ton cheaper than it can be produced in some other sections of the country.

Now, how are you going to get at the true measure of the difference in the cost of production of a commodity abroad and in this country when the variance in our own country is as great as that? [Applause.] This is what the Tariff Commission has to say about it:

COST OF PRODUCTION OF NEWS PRINT PAPER.

As will be seen from Tables 3 and 4, the total cost of production of news print paper in bulk at the mills varies from $25.38 to $39.57. This represents a variation of $14.19, equal to an excess of 55.9 per cent over the lowest cost. To account for this difference we find that the difference between the highest and lowest cost of ground wood is $10.75, and that $7.58 represents the difference in cost between the highest and lowest for sulphite, making a total difference in cost of pulp per ton of paper equal to $18.33, or more than the entire difference in the total cost of production of paper. The differences in the cost of production of pulp, both ground and sulphite, have been explained above.

The cost of other materials per ton of paper ranges from 31 cents to $3.08. These other materials are made up of fillers, alum, bleach chemicals, color, and sizing. The difference in the cost of these items per ton of paper is due partly to the difference in prices paid by various concerns and partly to the lack of uniformity in practice in the use of these materials resulting in a great deal of waste in some mills.

The cost of manufacturing labor per ton of product equals $3.25 on an average for the entire industry. It represents a variation from $2.19 to $6.06 per ton. * * *

Other costs, representing miscellaneous supplies, repair labor, operating expenses, etc., vary from $5.44 to $8.55, the average for the entire industry being $7.07. The most important item included in this group is the expense for repairs, consisting of repair materials and repair labor. On the item repair materials (Table 4) the cost per ton of paper varies from 6 cents to $2.14. This wide divergence has been referred to in the explanatory statement preceding the tables. Taking the unrevised figures, the high charge may be due to the fact that extensive repairs were made in a single year, instead of being distributed, or the differences may be due to divergence in equipment and age of machinery in the various plants.

The average cost of producing a ton of paper for the entire industry is $32.53. Nearly one-fourth of the tonnage investigated was produced at an average cost of $26.07 per ton; nearly one-half was produced at a cost of $32.90; and the remainder at an average cost of $37.25. All of these costs represent the charges actually carried on the books of the companies, including any profit charged on wood pulp, and without allowance for depreciation.

But a still more interesting statement, which shows the difference of the cost of production in the mills of the United States and Canada, is the following:

Table 9 gives the comparison of lowest cost, highest cost, and average cost in the mills of the United States and Canada. Attention should be called to the fact that in these tables * * * the totals do not equal the separate items, except in the case of the column for average cost. This is to be expected, as where lowest costs are given, the lowest figure is taken for each separate item, and no single mill has the lowest cost on all items. Consequently, the lowest total cost must be in excess of the sum of the preceding items. For exactly similar reasons, in the column giving highest costs the highest total cost will be below the sum of the separate items in the same column.

Lowest, highest, and average costs of production of pulp and news print paper in the United States and Canada.

Items.	Lowest cost per ton of product.		Highest cost per ton of product.		Average cost per ton of product.
	United States.	Canada.	United States.	Canada.	United States.	Canada.
Ground wood pulp:
Wood	$7.33	$5.74	$15.01	$9.71	$10.64	$7.07
Manufacturing, labor	.98	1.50	3.78	2.46	2.12	1.93
Other costs	.29	.82	7.00	3.30	2.02	2.14
Total cost in bulk at mills	10.13	9.57	20.07	14.72	14.78	11.13
Sulphite pulp:
Wood	13.28	12.02	25.89	18.04	19.08	14.32
Manufacturing, labor	2.09	2.87	4.83	5.45	3.63	4.15
Other costs	7.48	7.29	13.02	9.51	10.01	8.87
Total cost in bulk at mills	24.11	24.09	38.43	33.00	32.72	27.34
News print paper:
Ground wood pulp	7.79	7.18	18.54	10.88	12.61	9.22
Sulphite pulp	6.31	3.71	13.89	8.54	8.43	6.50
Manufacturing, labor	2.19	2.97	6.06	3.55	3.25	3.25
Other costs	6.75	8.44	11.63	10.12	8.24	9.42
Total cost in bulk at mills	25.38	25.17	39.57	30.27	32.53	28.39

From this it would appear that the difference in cost of production of news print paper in the United States and Canada is $4.14 per ton in favor of Canada. This does not include the reasonable profit referred to in the Republican platform, but simply the difference of cost of production. And yet the duty on news print paper is only $3.75 per ton under the Payne law. Small wonder that the paper manufacturers of the United States, with their $300,000,000 of invested capital, are vigorously protesting against this Canadian reciprocity measure. And I honestly believe that if it were not for this particular item of print paper and its twin sister, wood pulp, there would be "none so poor to do it"—the pending measure—"reverence."

The attitude of the Pacific coast paper manufacturers is well stated in the following letter:

WILLAMETTE PULP & PAPER CO. (INC.),
San Francisco, Cal., March 27, 1911.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please note the inclosed copy of a letter which we understand has been sent to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Washington by Mr. Howarth, president of the Everett Pulp & Paper Co. The arguments set forth therein have our thorough approval, and the facts as stated are not only correct as regards the effect upon the general paper industry, but are especially pertinent when considered with reference to the manufacture of news print paper.

The difference in cost of stumpage in Oregon or Washington and British Columbia is equivalent to about $2.50 per ton of finished paper in favor of British Columbia, and the exemption from taxes and from labor restrictions, also from duties upon articles used in manufacture, constitutes enough more difference to warrant the present tariff of $3.75 per ton. If that tariff should be taken off, British Columbia would have at least that advantage over manufacturers of the Pacific coast located within the United States.

We therefore ask that you do your utmost to protect one of the important industries of this coast by opposing the reciprocity treaty and leaving the duty on printing and other paper as it now stands, so that future expansion of the industry on this coast will not be confined entirely to British Columbia, and the capital which might otherwise be invested in the United States be diverted there.

Asking your thoughtful consideration of these questions and your support of the tariff upon our manufactured product, we remain,

Sincerely yours,

WM. PIERCE JOHNSON, President.

The President having called an extra session of Congress expressly for the purpose of considering the Canadian reciprocal treaty, we desire to lay before you facts bearing upon the same as affecting the pulp and paper industry.

As manufacturers of paper and pulp we are vitally interested in this so-called reciprocity, and danger lies in the different interpretations of the provisions which can be put upon same by Congress or the Treasury Department.

Paper makers might contend that paper or pulp can not come in free unless all restrictions are taken off by all the Provinces on wood cut on Crown lands, while the other interpretation would be by the publishers and users of paper that it can come in. Certain Canadian Provinces absolutely prohibit the export of pulp wood from Crown lands and refuse unconditionally to modify or in any way change from that position. There is sufficient wood and water power, other than the Crown lands of the different Provinces of Canada, to produce enough paper, mechanical and chemical pulp, to make inoperative many of our well-established concerns if Canadian paper products are permitted to come in free.

The whole paper industry of this country, in which there is invested some $300,000,000, would be in great danger in the future without a more definite understanding.

The manufacture of high-grade book papers, which next to newspaper is the most important in this country and in which great sums of money have been invested under the protective system, find a clause in the proposed treaty in the McCall bill "provided such paper and board valued at 4 cents per pound or less is to be admitted free."

The foregoing affects all paper and pulp industry of this country making paper from wood pulp below the value of 4 cents per pound.

Particularly in regard to the manufacture of book and magazine papers, of which grade this concern is the only one west of the Missouri and located on the Pacific coast, would we submit these facts.

During the investigation of the paper industry by the United States Government in 1908, a full report of which is now on file at Washington, D. C., this company made a sworn statement, as will be found on pages 1862 to 1866, inclusive, of such record, in which, on page 1865, we give reasons why the placing of newspaper, book, and magazine paper on the free-tariff list would mean the crippling, if not the annihilation, of our industry. (Excerpt from report hereto attached.) All of which reasons hold good to-day.

In consequence of the proposed free tariff being only with Canada, this makes our case more aggravated and furnishes stronger reasons for carrying out our contention, viz, the seeking of a location in British Columbia.

The further reasons other than those as contained in the attached excerpt are:

First. The concessions or subsidies offered by the British Columbia Government to encourage the establishing of pulp and paper industries in that Province, by which certain pulp-wood limits are assigned upon a nominal stumpage of 15 cents per cord for all pulp wood used during the first 21 years of operation, the stumpage to be paid thereafter being a matter of agreement, with privilege of cutting the timber on said wood limits into lumber upon paying a nominal rental as provided under timber limits, and a further stumpage charge of 50 cents per thousand on whatever is cut. In that way the best part of the tree is used for lumber and the balance for pulp and paper making, thus gaining two advantages.

Second. The granting in fee simple of water powers without cost other than cost of development.

The stumpage value to-day in the Pacific northwest of the United States of America for pulp wood not suitable for lumber is from 50 cents to 60 cents per cord, with yearly increase, and even if present concerns own their individual requirements, due to interest on investment and taxes, the difference at present values makes an advantage of about $1 per ton of paper made in favor of Canada, on pulp wood only, without taking into account the further advantage of lumber operation in connection with a pulp and paper mill. The stumpage value in Puget Sound district of the State of Washington to-day of similar class of timber to that in British Columbia, equally available to transportation by rail or water, is from $2 to $3 per thousand feet.

Third. Certain raw materials used by us in the manufacture of paper upon which there is a duty into the United States are admitted free into Canada, and which makes an increase in our cost of raw materials compared with Canada of about $12,845 per year, or $1.50 per ton of paper produced, viz:

	Duty into Canada.	Duty into United States.	Increased cost to us.
English china clay	Free	$2.50 per ton	$3,750
Bleaching powder	Free	¼ cent per pound	4,800
Alum	Free	½ cent per pound	795
Copper wire cloth	17½ per cent	45 per cent	1,000
Aniline dyes, ultramarine colors.	Free	30 per cent and 3 cents per pound.	1,000
Paper makers' felt ings and jacketings.	30 per cent.	44 cents per pound and 60 per cent.	1,500

Fourth. The employment of Japanese, Hindustani, and oriental labor, which are not employed in the States of Washington or Oregon in paper-mill operations, means an advantage in British Columbia of approximately $6 per ton of paper made.

It is surprising that in such an important matter, affecting as it does one of the largest industries of the country, viz, paper industry, the facts recited have been overlooked and, briefly stated, are:

1. Subsidies or concessions granted by Canada to encourage the locating of paper industries placed the United States paper industries at a disadvantage.

2. Unequal duties on raw materials entering into the manufacture of paper placing United States pulp and paper industries at a disadvantage.

3. The employment of cheap oriental labor.

4. The ambiguous language as to the export duty on wood used in the manufacture of paper, board, or wood pulp applying to Crown grant, pulp licensed, leased, or any other timbered lands.

The action of the President in suggesting practically free trade between Canadian Provinces and America on paper will, if followed by an act of Congress agreeing thereto, be a decided blow and serious menace to manufacturing of that kind of product on the Pacific coast of the United States.

At the time of the investigation by the United States Government in 1908 we made an exhaustive investigation of the conditions and advantages of location of pulp and paper industries in British Columbia, with the view of making all our additions in that Province, and we were then and are now prepared to consider seriously the removal of our plant to that country in case of the removal of the protective duty, for in addition to the adverse tariff action proposed by the President we are harassed on this coast by very stringent labor laws, labor commissions, and employers' liability laws, extraordinary taxes, both franchise and other, and, in fact, a generally arbitrary assailment of a legitimate manufacturing enterprise. By contrast the Canadian Government is extending all sorts of concessions to investors in that country.

A large plant is now under construction in British Columbia a little north of Vancouver, and will be absolutely unrestricted as to labor, whether white or oriental, will have practically no taxes to pay, and has received the most flattering concessions regarding timber limits from the Canadian Parliament.

If these suggestions of the President become law, we look for no further development of the paper industry on the Pacific coast of the United States.

We most respectfully ask your kind consideration of the facts as stated herein, and if after fully satisfying yourself that the general good of this country can be better served by the elimination of that feature of the Canadian reciprocal treaty affecting the pulp and paper industry we then believe your sense of duty will rightly direct your decision.

Yours, sincerely, ——— ———.

But, sir, this reciprocity measure strikes another important industry of the United States a serious blow. In the last Congress the cause of the New England fishermen was admirably presented by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] Now, the Pacific coast codfisheries represent an industry of no mean proportions. The men engaged in that industry on our western seaboard are just as bitterly opposed to this Canadian reciprocity bill as are their colleagues on the Atlantic seaboard. This is what one of the leading concerns in the codfishing industry on the Pacific coast has to say about the matter:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO,
San Francisco, March 1, 1911.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
United States House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed communication received by this organization from the Union Fish Co., protesting against the enactment of Federal legislation having for its object the free entry of Canadian salt fish into the United States, has received the unanimous approval of the board of trustees.

In behalf of the board the undersigned begs to commend the matter to your favorable and courteous consideration.

Yours, very truly,

C. W. BURKS, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 31, 1911.

Mr. C. W. BURKS,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce, San Francisco.

DEAR SIR: There is a matter which we would like to bring personally to your attention and to that of your officers and members of the chamber of commerce, but the absence of our president and vice president from the city prevent our doing so, and we are therefore compelled to present the subject to you in writing.

The matter referred to is in the nature of a protest against the Canadian reciprocity treaty now before Congress. This treaty provides for the free entry into the United States of green fish; that is, fresh fish, or fish salted and not dried, and would include codfish in bulk, as usually brought into port by regular codfishing vessels, and means a direct and unrestricted competition between the American codfishing firms and the codfishing vessels of Newfoundland, Canada, the Canadian Provinces, and British Columbia.

Our own interest lies, first, in our competition with the Atlantic coast. The present duty prevents any competition from there except with the American-caught fish. In very good years their nearness to the fishing grounds enables them to produce codfish more cheaply in Massachusetts than we can here, and enables them to sell quite close up to the Pacific States. When they have short catch we find a considerable market for Pacific-coast product through the Middle West and sometimes clear on to the Atlantic seaboard. Should this treaty become ratified the American codfish man on the Atlantic would be driven out of business entirely and the market there would be supplied by the Canadian and Provincial fishermen. The still shorter distance that they would have to go for their fish and, more particularly, the lower cost of labor in those countries would enable them to produce the fish so much more cheaply that they would not only displace the Massachusetts fishermen, but their fish would be shipped into our Pacific coast markets at such prices as would be almost sure to drive us out of the business. Any little trade that might otherwise remain to us would undoubtedly be absorbed by codfish caught in the North Pacific Ocean and the Bering Sea by vessels fitted out from British Columbia. The certainty of this would necessitate our either going out of the business or removing our headquarters to some British Columbia port and transferring our vessels to the British flag. This, of course, would enable us to import Canadian fishermen to the British Columbia side and prosecute our business over there, utilizing for our product the markets of the United States, which would be made free to us by this treaty.

The figures of the Pacific coast codfishing industry are given in the telegram annexed to this, which has been forwarded on to our Representatives in Washington, being as follows:

Amount invested in Pacific coast codfisheries	$1,000,000
Amount employed in outfitting, annually	150,000
Amount of disbursements at close of season, annually	250,000

Our interests, of course, are entirely on the American side of the Pacific coast. We are all American citizens, and are attached by ties of birth, loyalty, and patriotism to this country. We do not want to surrender our business and our investments in favor of any of the Canadians, nor do we want to remove ourselves and our investments into their territory.

Hence, our request to you that the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce voice our protest on behalf of our city and State and of the Pacific coast. We would add that we have forwarded telegrams to our Representatives, as per copies herewith, and in doing this we have been joined by all the other codfishing companies on the Pacific coast, and by some of the fresh-fish producers, who have themselves sent similar telegrams, all of which efforts we hope to have seconded by your body.

As a further general reason for this action we would add that there are even now too few American sailors and too few methods of increasing their number. That one of these few yet remaining is the deep-sea fisheries of the United States. And to ruin these or drive them from this country would be to remove this last nursery of the American seamen and still further lessen our chance and our hope of ever getting an American merchant marine or American sailors for an American Navy.

We trust that the reasons advanced in the foregoing will be sufficient to warrant official action of your body in making this protest and in urging it upon our Pacific coast Representatives, both in the House and in the Senate.

We remain, very truly, yours,

UNION FISH CO.,
J. W. PEW, President.
C. P. OVERTON,
Vice President and Manager.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to judge of the future by the experiences of the past, the farmers of the Northwest have every reason to be fearful of the consequences if this measure should become a law. With free entry of their cereal products into the United States and a greatly reduced rate of duty on practically all of their farm products, the output of the Canadian Provinces will increase enormously and will literally swamp the American farmer. The large increase of the production of sugar in Cuba after the enactment of the Cuban reciprocity law gave a staggering blow to the beet-sugar industry of the United States. Many of these beet-sugar refineries, seeing no future in the business in this country, sold out to the Sugar Trust, and it is universally known that the Sugar Trust now controls a large number of the beet-sugar refineries in this country. And so, in my judgment, this enormous increase of the products of the Canadian farmers will not reduce the cost of living to a single "ultimate consumer" in the United States, but it will largely increase the profits of the trust magnates. It will undoubtedly help to demoralize the farming industry of the West and the Northwest, just as the rapid development of those sections of our country demoralized the farming industry of New England and New York in the years gone by. But the New Englander and the New Yorker turned their attention to manufactures, and they have prospered. The farmers of the West and the Northwest have cheerfully stood for the protective tariff on the manufactures of the eastern section of our country, for they realize that with the mills, the factories, and the workshops busily engaged in turning out American wares there was a home market created for the products of the American farmers that would enable them to sell those products at remunerative prices.

If now the manufacturers of New England and elsewhere refuse to stand for the protection of the products of the American farmer against those of his Canadian competitor, those very manufacturers may awake to find that the American farmer, for his part, will refuse to stand for the protection of the products of the American manufacturer. The passage of this measure will, I fear, lead to reprisals. You are sowing the wind; take heed that you do not reap the whirlwind.

During the progress of this discussion I have heard many references made on this floor to the iniquitous trusts, and I believe that every effort should be made to destroy those trusts that seek to throttle and ruin competitors in order to be able to advance prices and control monopolies. Many of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber persist in charging up these trusts to that protective-tariff system that has brought such a great measure of prosperity to the American people. But let me remind them that England, which is generally looked upon as a free-trade country, is thoroughly honeycombed with trusts. In fact, it was there, I believe, where the trusts originated. And I would not be surprised to learn that much English capital is invested in American trusts. I would not be surprised to hear that English financiers and English capitalists own large percentages of the bonds and stocks of American trusts. Naturally, this English capital wants to see this Canadian reciprocity bill passed. I venture the prediction that the trusts, and the trusts alone, will reap all the reward if this measure shall be enacted into law.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when this measure was before the House in the last Congress I was opposed to it, but contented myself with simply voting against its passage, having faith in a Republican Senate that it would fail of enactment during that Congress, and that before the Sixty-second Congress would convene in regular session the sentiment of the people would be crystallized into such an opposition against it that the President would not again submit it. It happens, however, that the President, in his wisdom, has assembled the Congress in special session and has submitted this measure and urged its ratification. It is with great reluctance that I am compelled to oppose any proposition put forward by the President of my own party, and by one for whom I entertain as great an admiration and respect as I do for President Taft. I do not blame him for favoring this measure, and am disposed to take the same view as my good friend from Wyoming has taken in his remarks to-day, and that is to give him the credit of doing what he believes to be his duty, and having secured the best agreement that could be obtained, and being in a sense committed thereto, he has felt that he ought to submit it to Congress and recommend its acceptance. In doing this I say he is probably following what his conscience suggests to be his duty in the discharge of the high obligation resting upon him as the Executive, but having done what he has, namely, sent the agreement with his message to Congress, his obligation for the present ceases, as stated by the gentleman from Wyoming, and it is now for Congress to exercise its judgment and perform its duty as the Members thereof may in their best judgment decide. As one Member of the House, actuated by a feeling that otherwise I can not honestly and conscientiously discharge that duty in justice to my constituents and the people of the whole United States, I shall not only oppose it but vote against it, as I did in the last Congress. My reasons for opposing the proposition, and why in my opinion it should not be accepted, in a very brief way are as follows:

It is a measure inconsistent with the position of the Republican Party, as repeatedly declared in its platforms, and its enactment will be an injury to the agricultural interests of the country, and that will mean disaster to our general welfare, for you can not legislate against the prosperity of our farmers without indirectly affecting all our industries and injuring all of the people. That it is not a Republican measure admits of but little argument, and I shall not enter into any extended discussion to demonstrate this fact. I maintain, without fear of successful contradiction, that the Republican Party has never declared for reciprocity upon noncompeting products, neither has any great Republican, prior to the presentation of the pending proposition, ever taken any other position. President McKinley, in his inaugural address in 1897, defining reciprocity, said:

> The end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend to increase their employment.

Charles Emory Smith, who was Postmaster General in the McKinley administration, in defining it, said:

> When rightly understood, the principle is axiomatic. Brazil grows coffee, but makes no machinery. We make machinery, but grow no coffee. She needs the fabrics of our factories and forges, and we need the fruits of her tropical soil. We agree to concessions for her coffee; she agrees to concessions for our machinery. That is reciprocity.

This, I think, most clearly and accurately states the position of the Republican Party on what reciprocity is, and that is what the people have been taught to understand is meant by it.

Much is said about President McKinley's last speech at Buffalo, and it is asserted by the proponents of this measure that in that speech he modified his position on the subject of reciprocity, but a reference to his words fails to disclose anything to indicate that he would favor the reciprocity proposed by this proposition, and this one statement clearly indicates to the contrary, namely:

> We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

He could not have made that statement if he intended that he would favor a measure that would benefit and promote the manufacturers of the country at the expense of the farmer, and if anything is to be gained by accepting this measure it will be by the manufacturers.

That it is not a Republican measure is further demonstrated by the fact that in the last Congress it was opposed by a majority of the Republican Members of this House, 87 voting against it, while only 78 voted for it. The Democrats made it their party measure by adopting it in a caucus, and on the passage of the bill, with the exception of five, they all voted for it. A Republican Senate refused to consider it.

In this Congress I apprehend a majority of the Members on this side of the House are still opposed to it, and most of them will so vote, while the Democratic majority has again declared for it in a caucus and it is said that nearly all of them will vote for it.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri who to-day is the recognized leader of his party, in fact the most prominent Democrat in the country and who may be chosen in the next campaign as the standard bearer of his party, and I am sure he has the respect and the good will of every Member on this side of the House, a man who is recognized as a partisan in politics, at present the Speaker of this House, in a newspaper interview on the 5th instant, stated that this is a Democratic measure, and I know of no one better capable of properly christening it from a Democratic standpoint than he, and therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept his denomination of it and to regard it as a Democratic measure and to accord to him and his party the full responsibility for its enactment and the full benefit of any good that may come therefrom.

I may say in passing with reference to the distinguished gentleman, to whom I have just referred, that he represents the true position of Democracy upon the tariff question, as will appear by his frequent utterances in this House during the last 20 years. If he can have his way in dictating the legislation that will be enacted by this Congress relative to the tariff, it will mean his defeat in the next election, if he is nominated for the presidency, and the retirement of his party from control of this House for many years to come.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, in a three-hour speech in this House on Saturday last, declared it to be Democratic doctrine, as did the distinguished gentleman from New York, who declared himself for absolute free trade with all the world.

I have the honor of representing, in part, in this body an agricultural State and an intelligent people—a people who read and think for themselves and a large majority of whom usually vote the Republican ticket. In 1896, however, I regret to say, we elected for the first and only time in the history of our State two Members of this House who occupied seats on that side of the Chamber, and our electoral vote was cast for the Democratic candidate for the presidency.

In 1898 we redeemed the State and sent to the House two Republicans, of which I had the honor of being one. As our people had an opportunity to experience the benefits of Republican legislation, the McKinley tariff law, and to contrast the times with the four years of Democratic misrule, from 1893 to 1897, they became stronger and stronger in their Republican faith, each year giving a larger majority to the Republican ticket. I will not take the time to go into details as to our wonderful progress during the last few years, but I do want to mention that the last census discloses that in 10 years there has been an increase in the value of farm lands in South Dakota of 376 per cent, and there is also a very large increase in the value of farm buildings, farm implements, and live stock; our bank deposits are enormous and our people as a whole are prosperous and happy.

As an evidence of the conditions in our own State at present relative to the value of farm lands, I want to say that within the past 30 days the commissioner of school and public lands disposed of about 20,000 acres of school land in the different counties, all unimproved, and it sold at an average price of $52.60 per acre, and most of it was purchased by the farmers living in the localities, buying it for actual farming purposes.

Much has been said about the Payne tariff act passed by the last Congress. It was criticized and condemned probably more than any other tariff measure ever enacted, due largely to a hostile press. My colleague and I in the last campaign went before the people of our State and defended the measure, and, while admitting that it is not perfect, we declared it to be the best tariff act ever enacted, and we had the satisfaction of being returned to this House by an increased majority of about 5,000 over the majority we received in 1908, notwithstanding that was a presidential election. We each had a majority of more than 32,000 over our Democratic opponents. This shows what our people think of the Payne tariff law. They will be satisfied at least for the present if it is left alone. The President, in his Winona speech, denominated it the best tariff law ever enacted, and certainly there was no reason to believe that he would suggest any legislation changing or affecting the agricultural schedule, at least not in advance of a report from the Tariff Board, or until there is evidence that the schedules are too high. In presenting this proposition, judging from the President's speech at Springfield in February, he assumed that the tariff plank in the platform of the last Republican convention carried to its logical conclusion would lead to substantial free trade with Canada, and in his speech he said:

> With that in view, still adhering loyally and sincerely to the principles of protection where it is needed to maintain our important industries, I did not hesitate to give the widest latitude to the Secretary of State and the commissioners who represented this country in offering to Canada a reduction of duties on goods and products coming into this country from Canada in consideration of the establishment of the same duty, or freedom of duty, on similar goods going into Canada.

He also said:

> The conditions of production and of manufacture in the United States and in Canada are substantially the same.

In other words, he assumed that conditions here and in Canada are the same. In this he is in error, as can easily be demonstrated, but I will only briefly comment thereon. Owing to an advantage in the tariff the Canadian farmer can buy manufactured articles lower than can the American farmer; he also has an advantage in cheaper land, cheaper farm labor, and, against our eastern farmers, a soil that does not require fertilization. The National Grange asserts that by official reports it is established that the average value of farm lands in Canada is less than one-half the value of lands in the United States, and that the wages of farm labor in this country are from 20 to 25 per cent higher than in all of Canada except in the northwestern Provinces, where the wages are about the same as in our Northwestern States.

We hear it said that wheat is not affected by the tariff and that the price is fixed by Liverpool. No one will deny but what there has been an average difference of 10 or 11 cents in the price of wheat in Minneapolis and Winnipeg in favor of Minneapolis, and it dropped to less than four when it was known that this treaty was in negotiation and to less than 2 cents within a few weeks after the treaty was signed. My distinguished friend from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA], who speaks from personal knowledge on the subject of the price of wheat, gives us the prices at Portal and North Portal, the two places being one and the same—Portal in North Dakota and North Portal in Canada, across the street. On December 31, 1910, the price of wheat on the North Dakota side was 86 cents, while on the Canada side it was 75 cents, a difference of 11 cents in favor of the United States. That prices on farm products are high it is admitted, and yet not higher in proportion to labor and practically everything else.

Mr. HANNA also gives us the prices paid on January 9, 10, and 11, 1911, on barley and flax between points in North Dakota and Canada, only a short distance apart, and without repeating all of the towns that he mentions I will simply compare Pembina, in North Dakota, and Emerson, in Canada. The price paid for barley on the dates named at Pembina was 67 cents; Emerson, 42 cents; flax, Pembina, $2.32; Emerson, $1.93.

I want to briefly refer to the barley industry of this country and how it has developed since it was protected by a duty of 30 cents per bushel, and show what an injustice it would be to the barley growers of the United States to take away from them that duty and compel them to grow barley in competition with Canada.

In the report of the Tariff Board, submitted in response to Senate resolution of February 23, 1911, Senate Document No. 849, on page 99, Table 15, it gives the production of barley and farm prices in 1910, per bushel, in specified States, compared with Canada. The table is as follows:

Barley—Production and farm price in 1910, per bushel, in specified States, compared with Canada.

	Production.	Average yield per acre.	Farm price per bushel.
United States:	Bushels.	Bushels.
Maine	248,000	31.00	$0.760
New Hampshire	52,000	26.00	.720
Vermont	465,000	31.00	.680
New York	2,207,000	28.30	.700
Michigan	1,742,000	26.00	.580
Wisconsin	22,429,000	25.90	.640
Minnesota	26,985,000	21.00	.603
Iowa	15,045,000	29.50	.560
North Dakota	5,428,000	5.50	.550
South Dakota	18,655,000	18.20	.510
Montana	1,456,000	28.00	.620
Total	162,227,000	22.40	.578
Canada:
Prince Edward Island	159,600	28.00	.572
Nova Scotia	264,000	30.33	.766
New Brunswick	73,000	35.29	.670
Quebec	2,547,000	24.49	.713
Ontario	20,727,000	29.75	.583
Manitoba	13,826,000	20.21	.390
Saskatchewan	3,598,000	26.18	.358
Alberta	3,953,000	20.32	.383
Total	45,147,000	24.62	.474

It will be noted that there is an average difference in price of 10 cents per bushel. The production in the United States, in round numbers, as shown by this table, is 162,000,000 bushels, which is about double the production prior to the enactment of the Dingley law, putting on a duty of 30 cents a bushel. The Tariff Board confirms this statement, and I quote the following from page 105:

> Previous to 1897 the rate of duty on barley was 30 per cent ad valorem. By the law of 1897 this duty was changed to 30 cents a bushel. Under the former rate of duty there were large importations of barley from Canada to the United States. In 1894 more than 2,000,000 bushels were imported; in 1897, over 1,000,000 bushels. After the imposition of the duty of 30 cents per bushel the importations dropped to somewhat more than 124,000 bushels, and in 1909 only 2,420 bushels were imported.
> The price of barley in Canada is generally below the price in the United States.

I would like some one to tell me how, in the face of these statistics and the statements of the Tariff Board, the enactment of this measure is not going to harm the farmers of the United States who are engaged in raising barley. Perhaps those who support this proposition can justify it on the grounds of lower prices. I presume they are concerned to cheapen the manufacture of beer, in order to increase the profits of the brewer, for certainly no one will contend that to cheapen barley 10 cents a bushel will affect the price of a glass of beer.

We hear a great deal about lower prices. We had low prices from 1893 to 1897, but no one will say that anyone was benefited thereby. What difference does it make how low prices are if you have no money? A man when he is hungry must eat, and the price does not cut any figure if he has not the wherewith to buy a meal. I maintain that when prices are high prosperity usually prevails and there is little complaint of lack of money to buy with, and the people live better than ever before. Who, if anyone, is going to benefit if this measure is enacted into law? Principally the packing houses, the millers, the brewers, the large users of wood-pulp manufactures, and those who will directly profit by the transportation of Canadian farm products. I doubt if it will directly benefit the ultimate consumer, for in my judgment the tariff on food products is too small to directly affect the retail price. No one will say that 10 cents on a bushel of wheat will cheapen the price of a loaf of bread or even a sack of flour, and so by cheapening the price to the producer, if there is any gain, it is to the manufacturer and the middleman.

I said that I represent an agricultural constituency and a thinking people. The American farmer generally thinks for himself, and I want to say to those who represent manufacturing and city constituents that before they strike down the small amount of protection that the farmers now enjoy they had better think twice, for there is likely to be retaliation, and you who believe in protection want to remember that you never would have had any McKinley law or any Dingley law and that the Payne law would not now be upon our statutes if it were not for the farmers of our country.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of the Northwest, particularly in the States of Minnesota and North and South Dakota, have recently been holding conventions in the different parts of those States and adopting resolutions showing what they think of this measure, and now that this debate is about to close, and before a vote is taken on this bill, it seems to me proper and appropriate that the farmers of the Northwest should be heard. Therefore in order that they may have that opportunity, in order that this House may know their position, and in order that the country may know it, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a copy of the resolutions adopted by the farmers of Brown County, at Aberdeen, in my State, on Friday last, the resolutions being substantially the same as those adopted in mass conventions by the farmers of the other States that I have named.

The Clerk read as follows:

We, the farmers and business men of Brown County, S. Dak., in mass meeting assembled, do most earnestly and sincerely protest against the ratification by Congress of the pending treaty with Canada in its present form.

In doing so we hereby announce and publish the following reasons:

First. That the treaty is unfair, unjust, and discriminating against the agricultural interests of the United States, giving these interests practically nothing in return for what it deprives them of.

Second. That it will inure to the disadvantage, loss, and suffering of our producers without any prospect of cheaper manufactured products to the consumer.

Third. That the removal of the duty on wheat will accrue solely to the benefit of the miller, that of barley to the brewer, that of flaxseed to the linseed mills, and that of live stock, hogs, poultry, and dairy products to the packers and middlemen, and while not benefiting the consumer will mean a great loss to the producers.

Fourth. It creates an unfair competition, inasmuch as it will compel our farmers to compete in our own markets with cheaper-produced products of alien competitors. We contend that our home market belongs in the first instance to our own citizens.

Fifth. This pact, if agreed to, will retard and set back the progress toward a higher and better standard of farm life, which has become so noticeable during the recent prosperous times; it will tend to bring on again that struggle for existence, so well remembered by our pioneer farmers, a struggle in which many went under; it will lessen the opportunities for a better education of our farmers' children, and thus encourage them in leaving the farm.

Sixth. It will lessen the purchasing capacity of our American producers to the extent of millions of dollars annually by depriving them of a legitimate and fair price for their products. All of this will represent a corresponding loss to the commercial interests of our country, as the farmer's profit invariably finds its way into all the channels of trade. Our commercial and manufacturing interests stand to lose as much in this way as they will gain by the expansion of their business.

FARMERS MAKE COUNTRY.

Seventh. Our American farmers, by their thrift, energy, and frugality, have made this country what it is; they have made it possible for the great commercial interest to become wealthy and powerful; without the farmer this would have been impossible. In view of this our commercial interest should now stand by the farmer. To do otherwise lays them open to the charge of commercial greed and selfishness.

Eighth. The term "reciprocity" as applied to the Canadian treaty is a misnomer. Reciprocity means an equitable trade or exchange between two countries of products one country produces and the other does not or which it produces only in insufficient quantities. We produce everything in this country that is produced in Canada.

Ninth. It constitutes an agreement made secretly and without regard to any settled polices of our tariff laws. It means free trade for the farmer and protection for the manufacturer, and as such is discrimination in its rankest form.

Tenth. That in trading off our home market of more than 90,000,000 people, a market that is, and has been, abundantly supplied by our own producers, a market that has been built up by American thrift and frugality, and which, by every inherent right and heritage, belongs to our producers, for that of 8,000,000 Canadians, with its doubtful increased advantages to commercial and manufacturing interests, would not only be unfair and unjust to our own producers, but foolish and reprehensible.

Eleventh. This proposed treaty, when divested of its sentimental features, can and will appeal only to those who are selfishly interested and who expect to gain thereby. As a whole, it will be a damage rather than a benefit to our country. We are opposed to its passage in any form which puts agricultural products on the free list and protects manufactured interests.

Twelfth. We repudiate the action of President Taft, large manufacturing, chambers of commerce, and the management of the Great Northern Railway, in attempting to force the so-called reciprocity agreement through Congress without giving the people at large an opportunity to give it due consideration or to express their opinions. We regret exceedingly that the city press has failed to give publicity to both sides of this most important question.

WILL NOT REDUCE LIVING COST.

Thirteenth. The proposed pact would not reduce the cost of living. It would not benefit the laboring man, the mechanic, or artisan in the great cities, as the exorbitant prices paid by them for produce is not occasioned by the price received by the farmer, but is the result of the excessive charges made by the railroads and middlemen. The farmer only receives 35 per cent of the price paid by the consumer, while the transportation companies and middlemen receive the other 65.

Fourteenth. We hereby express our thanks to all those newspapers of our State who in this controversy have risen above considerations of selfishness and have defended farming interests against this threatening danger, and we mention expressly the Aberdeen Daily News, and we also thank those citizens who have interested themselves in calling this meeting.

Fifteenth. We urge on all of our citizens who are in favor of fair play and equality before the law to make continuous and effective agitation against this treaty.

Sixteenth. That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this measure will pass this House, but let it pass unassisted by Republican votes and be understood that it is Democratic doctrine. I appeal to the Republican membership of this body to stand loyally by the principle of protection which hitherto has been applied by Republican administrations to American industries without discrimination as to class. Let us keep fath now with the American farmer, who has been the bulwark of the Nation since the foundation of the Government and without whose allegiance no Republican administration ever was inaugurated at the National Capital. Our defeat will be but temporary if we remain true to Republican policies, policies that have made the Nation great beyond the dreams of prophets. Let us on this side of the House realize that dishonor can come to us in defeat only to the extent of our acceptance of this strange faith. Those who stand faithful in this trial will retain their self-respect and in the near future will form the nucleus of an invincible party that will again carry the Republican banner to victory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I regret that only a few minutes' time has been allotted to me to discuss this great question which is now before the House. Had I been permitted to enter into this discussion earlier, the limited time now given me would have been more appropriate, for I should not have desired to have said as much as I now feel like doing, for as each day and hour goes by many facts and statements are made, wholly or partially true. On the other hand, much misinformation has been spread upon the records. Hence to even do the subject partial justice would require hours instead of minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in what I shall say I shall endeavor, as far as possible, to refrain from indulging in any statements of a partisan nature. This proposed legislation deals with matters that are purely nonpartisan, for it is a subject in which the American people as a whole are vitally interested. Much has been said during this discussion on both sides of the Chamber as to who is responsible for the initiation and the continued insistence of this legislation. Aside from any political advantage to be obtained therefrom or any responsibility therefor, be it a Republican or Democratic measure, it is immaterial, as far as its beneficial or nonbeneficial qualities to the American people as a whole are concerned. While it is a fact that this measure during the last session of Congress was presented to us by our esteemed President and was reported to the House by a Republican Ways and Means Committee and passed by this branch of Congress while the majority was Republican, yet it failed of ultimate passage. Now it comes before us from a Democratic source, reported by a Democratic Ways and Means Committee, and indorsed by the majority party as a caucus measure. On our side of the Chamber there is a great division of sentiment as to its merits, and with less division on the Democratic side. Be it Democratic or Republican, to my mind it is manifestly unjust, and wherever the votes come from, North or South, East or West, Democratic, Republican, or Socialist, if this so-called reciprocity measure is enacted into law, I believe it ought to be named the legislative mistake of 1911. I predict that every man who votes for it will in the future regret that he did so.

All of our great leaders have designated and proclaimed reciprocity as a trade agreement between foreign countries in noncompeting products. That is, products that are indigenous to one country and not to the other. In no instance have I been able to find where free trade between two countries in the same products was ever considered or designated as reciprocity. This pact or trade agreement is chiefly confined to agricultural products between the Dominion of Canada and the United States upon a free-trade basis. Hence, our farmers are asked to compete with the farmer of the great Dominion lying immediately to the north.

The great industries of our country have been fostered and built up under the protective system for more than 50 years. At this time in nearly all the manufacturing industries we are equal to, if not greater, than any in the world. Originally our industries were small and needed protection against the older countries of Europe, and the great majority of our people cheerfully granted this aid. The agriculturist and the professional man, the clerk and the laborer were of one mind, believing it to be better to convert the raw material into the finished product within our own borders than pay for transportation to and from the foreign factory. By this protective system we have been enabled to pay the laborer in our factory just wages, thus enabling him to purchase the produce of the farm at a living price.

For many years our farmers have been told that with the increase of our manufacturing industries and the many workmen who would be employed that the time would come when consumption on this continent would equal the production of their farms and thus they would greatly profit thereby. That doctrine has proven true. At this time the production of the farm is very little, if any, in excess of home consumption. Heretofore while the tariff schedules show that a high protective duty was placed upon the cereal and live-stock production of the farm, yet until recently the direct benefit to the farmer was only negligible, for he had no competitor. Within the past few years, however, our neighbor on the north, with his vast area of fertile land, is producing millions of bushels of all kinds of grains and great herds of live stock. This Canadian production is also at greatly reduced cost. While the cost of labor is comparatively equal, yet the value of the farm lands is hardly one-half in Canada to that of our own, while the production per acre, owing to the newness and fertility of soil, is about one-third greater.

Let us examine as to the magnitude and quality of our Canadian competitor. There are five great fertile Provinces in Canada, any one of which is almost equal in area to four or five of our Middle West States. I shall describe only three of them, however. Manitoba has 27,000,000 acres of as fine tillable land as any on this continent. Saskatchewan, with its total area of over 160,000,000 acres, has 86,826,200 acres of tillable land surpassed by none, while Alberta has 100,000,000 acres of the same kind of land. The average production of wheat per acre during the year 1909 in all of these three Provinces was 21.1 bushels; that of the United States for the same year was 15.8 bushels per acre. Thus it appears from these figures that the productive quality of the Canadian land is much greater than our own. This same ratio of productiveness applies to the yield of barley, oats, and flax, while the value of the land per acre is almost double in the United States as compared with Canada. There is but one conclusion—the American farmer can not successfully compete with his Canadian neighbor. But one result can follow—the Canadian land must raise in value or the American land must decline. Probably one will go up and the other down, to the great detriment of our people and the advantage of our neighbor. The statistician and the expert in figuring percentages inform us that the Canadian in the past has produced very little compared to us; but let us examine into the truth of this assertion. The Canadian crop of wheat in 1909, in round numbers, was 167,000,000 bushels, grown upon about 8,000,000 acres of land. The total yield of oats for that year was 353,466,000 bushels; barley, 55,398,000 bushels; and flax, 2,232,000 bushels. To show the rapidity with which the cereals of the Canadian farmer in the Province of Saskatchewan alone have advanced in the total yield, I will insert in the RECORD, with permission of the House, the following table:

Growth of wheat production, Saskatchewan.

	Wheat.	Oats.	Barley.	Flax.
1898	4,780,440	1,589,412	182,859
1899	6,083,508	2,518,248	160,604
1900	3,443,671	1,604,561	150,822
1901	11,956,069	5,517,886	354,703
1902	13,110,330	6,975,796	298,632	153,709
1903	15,121,015	9,164,007	655,593	285,697
1904	15,944,730	10,756,350	589,336	166,434
1905	26,107,286	19,213,055	893,396	398,399
1906	37,040,098	23,965,228	1,316,415	710,689
1907	27,691,601	23,324,903	1,350,265	1,364,716
1908	50,654,529	48,379,838	3,965,724	2,589,352
1909	90,215,000	105,455,000	7,833,000	4,448,700

It may be interesting to note that in this Province, in 1898, with only a very small portion of its land under cultivation, there was raised only 4,780,000 bushels of wheat. Eleven years later, with only about 12 per cent of her occupied land under cultivation, there was raised over 90,000,000 bushels of wheat. The increase from 1908 to 1909 was nearly 40,000,000 bushels. The increase in the yield of oats from 1908 to 1909 in this Province, in round numbers, was 57,000,000 bushels.

Without reading this schedule, I call the attention of the House and country to it, that it may be seen how rapidly production in Canada is increasing. Should this proposed measure become a law and the Canadians be given the great advantages of our home market, it would be folly to assert that this ratio of increase in production would not continue.

Mr. Chairman, this is the free-trade competition that we are tendering to our agriculturists. We are asking them to share with the stranger the market which they have built up by over a hundred years of sacrifice and toil. We say to the Canadian: Enter into this paradise, with your immense area of cheaper and more fertile lands, and reap the reward which should belong to our own people, without price. I for one, Mr. Chairman, can not subscribe to this doctrine.

The section of the country from which I come and the district I represent is in the spring-wheat, barley, and oats belt of the great Northwest. It is sometimes designated as the home of the No. 1 hard and No. 1 northern wheat. My own State of Minnesota is the banner wheat-producing State of the Union. This Northwestern section can have only one competitor, and that is the Dominion of Canada, for that is the only other territory on this continent where this most excellent quality of grain is grown. It is frequently asserted on the floor of this House that Liverpool fixes the price of our grain, and especially of wheat. This I deny. The price of this wheat is now and always has been fixed at Minneapolis and Duluth, Minneapolis being the largest primary wheat market in the world and its flouring mills the greatest. Liverpool does at times have a tendency to fix the price upon a considerable portion of the winter wheat and other soft grades of wheat raised in the United States.

But for the No. 1 northern and No. 1 hard spring wheat it never has and never will, unless perchance it does after the passage and enactment into law of the measure now under consideration. Without wearying the House with voluminous statistics I assert that for many years past the price on this grade of wheat has been higher in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg or Port Arthur on an average of at least 10 cents per bushel. Frequently during many years the differences in price has been as great as 15 cents. Again, I am informed that the distance from Winnipeg to Liverpool is about 500 miles nearer than from Minneapolis to Liverpool, with equal rail and water transportation facilities. Such being the case, if Liverpool fixes the price and Liverpool is the destination for the surplus grain of Canada, why is it that the Minneapolis and Duluth price is from 10 to 15 cents per bushel higher? Why is it that all along the border line between Canada and the United States at every point where wheat is purchased the Canadian price is from 9 to 15 cents per bushel lower than on the American side? I assert that this difference in price did exist just prior to the day when this Canadian reciprocity agreement was submitted to the House for its consideration on January 26, 1911. At many points where this difference in price existed the distance between them was only from 2 to 30 miles.

Mr. Chairman, in proof of my statement I shall insert in the RECORD a statement showing comparative prices in wheat and barley in the United States and Canada.

This statement was compiled by Senator McCUMBER, of North Dakota, the figures having been obtained by him from responsible parties at the points designated and indicating the actual cash price paid for wheat on the days mentioned.

I wish particularly to call attention to that portion of the schedule pertaining to Portal and North Portal, showing the comparative prices on both wheat and barley, Portal and North Portal being a village on the border line between Canada and the United States. North Portal is on the Canadian side and Portal on the American side, with only a street dividing them. On December 31, 1910, the price of wheat in Portal was 90 cents per bushel, and on the same day the same wheat in North Portal was 75 cents per bushel, a difference of 15 cents. You will notice that this difference of about 15 cents per bushel exists between all the points mentioned in the schedule. Does Liverpool fix the price?

Mr. Chairman, the message of our President and the bill under discussion was submitted to Congress January 26, 1911. On that date the price of this grade of wheat in Minneapolis was $1.04⅜ per bushel, and in Winnipeg on the same day it was 94¼ cents. Two days after, on January 28, 1911, the price of this grade of wheat in Winnipeg went up 1¼ cents a bushel, and in Minneapolis it went down 5 cents a bushel. The cause assigned for this sudden change was noted in the Minneapolis Journal as due to the possibility of this reciprocity bill being passed. A few days later in these same markets the Minneapolis price went down to 98⅜ cents and the Winnipeg price remained virtually stationary. On February 11, and after about a 10-cent decline in the Minneapolis market, the Minneapolis Journal, which reports the daily proceedings of the market, stated:

> This decline has put the United States nearer an export basis, but still further declines will be necessary to allow this country to enter the European markets with any profit, and many of the local traders of the chamber of commerce predict that domestic prices would continue to decline until this country was put on an export basis.

Mr. Chairman, this is what this form of reciprocity means to the farmers of the Northwest, who are producers of this grade of wheat. All that I have said with reference to wheat applies with equal force, if not greater, to barley.

Mr. Chairman, it is a common statement outside of this Chamber that one of the great blessings which the farmer will receive under the provisions of this pact is free lumber. In my limited time I shall not attempt to fully discuss the provisions in regard to lumber in this bill. In brief, I will say that the duty upon partly finished or finished lumber is somewhat reduced, while rough boards are placed on the free list. This can be of little benefit to the farmer, since unfinished boards are used by him in small quantities only. His house is constructed chiefly of finished lumber. The difference in weight is considerable, the finished product being scarcely more than three-quarters of an inch in thickness, while the rough board is a full inch. Hence the item of freight is so considerable that very little of it would be imported any considerable distance. It might be imported from Canada to the nearest American mill free and there finished by planing and otherwise, and then sold to the American consumer under the tariff schedule of rates prescribed for that grade. I am unable to see how the American consumer can possibly receive any benefit from the removal of the tariff on rough boards.

Mr. Chairman, right here I will digress a moment from the subject I have been attempting to discuss. During the discussion this afternoon a friend of mine on this floor, in a serious but friendly manner, somewhat criticized me as to my ideas on the subject of protection, and particularly called attention to a controversy between myself and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] concerning free lumber. During that controversy the gentleman from North Carolina asked me if I voted for free lumber at the time our recent tariff bill was under discussion. Upon my informing him that I did and that I should do so again if opportunity presented, the gentleman from North Carolina stated that he voted for free lumber and would do so again. Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the vote I cast for free lumber and trust that I may be given the opportunity to do so again, for I firmly believe that the lumbering interests of this country do not at this time need any protection.

In this connection I wish to say that the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin a few years ago had immense quantities of very fine pine and other timber suitable for manufacture of lumber, and there still remains considerable. We have many of the finest and best equipped sawmills in the country, Minneapolis being at one time the great lumbering center of the United States. In my State we have some of the leading lumbermen, and I mention in this connection the names of Mr. Weyerhaeuser, Thomas Shevlin, C. A. Smith, and T. B. Walker. I am informed that these men are among the leading manufacturers of lumber and stumpage owners in the United States. I speak of them for the purpose of showing that by reason of the conditions surrounding them and aided by a high protective tariff they succeeded admirably in their enterprises. I do not know the opinion at this time of any of these gentlemen on the subject of the lumber tariff, whether they all desire its retention or not, yet Mr. Shevlin has expressed himself on the subject recently and has stated that he did not think that any further protection on lumber was needed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, believing that Mr. Shevlin is correct, and according to my settled convictions on the subject of a protective tariff, that it should be withdrawn whenever and wherever it is unnecessary, I therefore voted against further protection, and shall continue to do so in the future until conditions change materially from what they are at present.

Mr. Chairman, my people and myself were among the early pioneers in the great State of Minnesota. Aside from a few small cities and villages along the border the great interior was one vast wilderness of timber and prairie land occupied almost solely by the Indians. Our settlement was made near the center of this magnificent area in the timber belt. I know personally the hardships and trials of a pioneer on a timber farm. For more than 50 years these farmers have worked unceasingly from early morn until late at night in order to subdue nature, build up their farms, and make a home for themselves and families. To-day they are enjoying the fruits of their labor.

I will venture the assertion concerning the farmers of the Middle West and the great Northwest who went upon their farms 50 or 75 years ago that if you will estimate their services at 50 cents a day and the services of the housewife and grown sons and daughters at 25 cents per day, their total earnings would greatly exceed the present value of their farms. They own their farms simply and solely because they have worked unceasingly all the day and part of the night, and thus have improved their farm and home, and to-day they are beginning to reap the reward for their labor. The great home market is and ought to remain their market, and not given over without compensation to the stranger across the border.

My friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is in favor of this bill and asserts that the farmers of his State are prosperous and desire its enactment into law. Mr. Chairman, the farmers of Oklahoma have only recently occupied their land and under the most favorable condition. It is only within the past few years that they began the arduous task of developing their farm and building their home. From the very first—and I am glad it is so—they enjoyed this splendid home market which had been provided for them many years before, and they are now reaping the speedy benefit of what their predecessors in adjoining States had worked for generations to build up. It is only within the last few years that the grain and stock raiser in the United States had any competitor. The Canadian competitor had not developed. Until this recent development and enormous production became manifest, the protection accorded the farmer by our tariff laws was of negligible value, yet he was informed, and I believe correctly so, that the building up of the manufacturing industries would ultimately be of great benefit to him, for the reason that it would give him a sure and more profitable market for his grains and live stock. Now the time has come when that condition has arrived. In fact, consumption in the United States about equals production. It is proposed in this bill to strip the farmers of all protection whatever, force him backward, open up this great market to the stranger, while he is compelled to sell his product in the cheapest market and purchase the product of the factory in the highest.

This, my friend, is unjust, inequitable, and to my mind wholly unwarranted. I shall never vote for such a measure.

Some of my political friends have come to me and said, "DAVIS, you have been talking for revision of the tariff downward." I responded, "Yes; and always have been since the day of my election to Congress." They then said, "Why do you propose to vote against this measure, because it certainly is a revision downward, and it is an entering wedge for further revision downward?" True, it is an entering wedge, but is this the proper time and proper place to force an entering wedge? More than 50 years ago the East, the manufacturing section, began its very successful enterprises under a high protective tariff system. It has reaped rich benefits therefrom. Now that the farmers are just beginning to receive a part of this benefit, it is proposed to strike them down and enter the wedge and crush those who have received the least from this system. Yes, my friends, I believe in this entering wedge, but why not begin in such schedules as the woolen, cotton, sugar, steel, and other related ones? Give to the farmer cheaper clothing, cheaper building materials, cheaper fuel, at the same time you are demanding of him cheaper food products. Thus you will benefit the great mass of the producers and consumers alike. But, say, our Democratic friends, we propose to follow this reciprocity measure by another placing many articles of consumption for the benefit of the consumer on the free list. That sounds well, and if it could be accomplished, in my judgment, it would be well. Yet the discussion thus far has revealed the fact that our Democratic friends and all assert the great improbability of the passage of this other measure. While it may pass this branch of the Congress, yet obstacles apparently unsurmountable probably will defeat it during the life of the Sixty-second Congress. Hence I pause and shall not vote for the bill under discussion or any similar measure until conditions warrant the belief of the passage of the other.

When this trade agreement was presented by the President to the Congress during the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, considerable stress was laid in the message accompanying it upon the necessity of lessening the cost of food products to the consumer. In fact, that was the main consideration assigned for urging the passage of this bill. From the context of the message the President assumes that while the consumer would be much benefited yet the producer of grains and live stock would not be injured.

It is difficult to comprehend how the consumer can be furnished a cheaper food unless some one produces and sells it cheaper. While it is very apparent that the cheap land of Canada can and does produce food products in greater quantity per acre and at less cost than the American farm, yet it has not been shown that the consumer will receive any benefit. The reason for this lies in the fact that while the farmer in the two countries must sell his produce on equal terms in a free-trade market, the manufacturer of flour still retains a high protective duty. The 4½ bushels of wheat which enters into the manufacture of a barrel of flour, after it becomes flour, the miller is protected in at the rate of 50 cents a barrel. While the farmer's fat cattle must be sold in this cheap competitive market, yet the meat therefrom in the hands of the American packer receives the benefit of 1¼ cents per pound when dealing with the consumer. Such is the case with all other products of the farm. In all instances the interest of the manufacturer is highly protected, to the disadvantage of the consumer, while the producer of live stock and grains must sell in the cheapest market, to his loss, which in no way benefits the consumer. Many examples might be given showing that the farmer receives very little benefit, even under existing conditions, from the high price paid by the consumer. For example, at present prices throughout the United States the farmer's wheat nets him about 80 cents a bushel. The flour from this bushel of wheat will make at least 60 loaves of bread, which retails to the consumer at 5 cents a loaf, showing that the consumer has to pay $3 for what the farmer receives but 80 cents. A bushel of oats, for which the farmer receives from 30 to 35 cents, will make 23 packages of Quaker Oats, which retails to the consumer at 10 cents per package, or $2.30.

Mr. J. R. Cahill, an investigator for the labor department of the Board of Trade, London, England, came to this country to investigate cost of living. After visiting several of our large cities and before his departure he stated that he found that the consumers in this country paid 5 cents for a 14-ounce loaf of bread, while in London a 64-ounce loaf retailed for 10 cents, the London loaf being made out of American flour. Thus the fact is apparent that the middlemen, including the miller and retailer and the baker, should not be overlooked in our effort to lessen the cost of food products to the consumer. I might cite many instances as showing that the price paid the farmer is very small compared to that paid by the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this measure for another good reason. Ever since the passage of the Morrill Act of 1862 the Federal Treasury has materially assisted in the establishment of agricultural colleges and experiment stations in every State in the Union. In addition thereto each State has contributed immense sums to educate the agriculturists in scientific farming. Our great Department of Agriculture, with all its ramifications—which, in my judgment, is the greatest department of our Government—employs thousands of scientists and spends millions of money annually to further the science of agriculture. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated by the National and State Governments in furthering agricultural education. While this system was inaugurated by the Federal Government, yet the various States have responded nobly, and are continuing to do so. Increased agricultural production of superior quality is of the greatest consideration. Its benefits are numerous and manifold. The building up of the home in rural communities, dignifying the labor of the farm, so that it becomes a science, adds to the health, wealth, prosperity, and manhood of the yeomanry, aside from generally benefiting our entire population. Again, it is apparent to all that the congested population of our larger cities is an actual menace to the welfare of our country. The best solution of this problem is to keep our agricultural population in the highest possible state of prosperity and happiness. This can not be done by the enactment of the legislation contemplated by this bill. In my judgment this proposed legislation would defeat the very object for which the Department of Agriculture, schools and colleges of agriculture, and experiment stations were established. Should this legislation be enacted, the slogan "Back to the farm" or "Remain on the farm" would lose its force. Depreciate the value of the land and the price of the products therefrom and inevitably the migration from country to city will greatly increase.

Our President in his message has alluded to the sentimental side of this proposed legislation. The Canadian is pictured in glowing terms. It is urged that this proposed agreement should be entered into because of the Canadian's racial affinity to us as well as his proximity to our border. His temperamental and social similarity and kindly feeling toward us is put forward as a further argument for the enactment of this measure.

No standing army need guard our borders against him, no battleships need float the great inland seas that divide us; but, on the contrary, we should welcome and invite him to enter our land and partake of this great home market without price. This, to my mind, is unjust to our own people, and furnishes no reason for the passage of this bill. I assert and believe that while the Canadian is peaceably disposed and one whom we should at all times treat kindly and justly, yet, at the same time, the welfare of our own people should be uppermost in our minds. I do not understand that by this legislation we propose to make him one of us, for he belongs to another nation. His Government is a monarchy. His allegiance is to his King, and not to our Government or its institutions. His allegiance binds him to give preference to the British Crown, and while he will accept our hospitality and the great benefit which he will derive from this proposed legislation, he will be a stranger to us in all things governmental.

I am strongly opposed to this bill and shall vote against it. Yet, if it must become a law—which seems probable—then I trust that a divine Providence who shapes the destinies of nations may so use this so-called reciprocity treaty, this entering wedge, to further amalgamate these two countries and eventually make them one, with but one flag—the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Minnesota proceeds, I desire to suggest that this debate has now been proceeding since last Friday, and I am wondering whether we could not prevail upon the gentlemen who are managing the enterprise to take the committee into their confidence as to when a vote may be expected. It seems to me that that is a proper inquiry to make at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am in hopes that we can take the bill up under the five-minute rule at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it the design of the gentleman to conclude debate to-night?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say candidly to the gentleman that I have had an understanding with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to close the general debate, except the closing speeches, to-night, and that to-morrow, when the closing speeches are made, we will then take it up under the five-minute rule for consideration.

Mr. KENDALL. What time this evening will the committee rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am willing to let the debate go on. I hope we will get through by 6 o'clock.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is proper for me to say to the gentleman that if the committee continues after 6 o'clock a quorum of the committee ought to be present.

Mr. JAMES. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the proceedings are by unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent I will say to the gentleman that I have tried to be very liberal with that side of the House. I have not only yielded to the other side of the House, but I have yielded to gentlemen on that side of the House who were in favor of the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has had considerably more time than we have had, and I was in hopes, as the debate has run for many, many hours longer than it was allowed to run when it was before the House at the last session, that the gentleman would allow it to run longer without interruption in order that as many Members may have an opportunity to get in as possible.

Mr. KENDALL. I think no possible complaint can be made against the gentleman from Alabama with respect to time allowed for discussion. The only thing in the matter to me is this, that where the discussion is so general, that a quorum of the committee ought to be present to hear the arguments—that is, after 6 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I regret very much if the gentleman sees proper by reason of no quorum here to cut off any Member's privilege to be heard, but the responsibility will then rest with him and not with me.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, that is not my proposition at all. There is no need of haste with reference to concluding this discussion and limiting men to two, three, or five minutes and from the clamor for opportunity to discuss this bill. I think we ought to take another day.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, the complaint heretofore made by gentlemen on that side of the House was that they had not had time enough to debate questions up for consideration. Now the complaint is because they have too much.

Mr. KENDALL. Not at all. The gentleman, with his usual obtuseness, fails to understand the substance of my complaint. What I am suggesting is that these arguments are of importance to the country and there ought to be a quorum to listen to them.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman, with his usual desire to make complaint when there is nothing to complain about, is pursuing his old course.

Mr. DALZELL. As this matter is proceeding by unanimous consent, I desire to say that, as debates go in this House, the gentleman from Alabama has been exceedingly fair from the beginning to the end of this debate. [Applause.] He has not only been fair, but he has been generous in this respect, that while he believes it to be the wish of his side of the House, which is in the majority, to close this debate substantially to-night, he has permitted the people whom I represent to continue until each of them has had an opportunity to be heard, even though slightly, and if there is any complaint to be made, as I have no doubt there is complaint being made, the complaint is due to me for my distribution of the time on this side, in which I have endeavored to be as fair as circumstances would permit. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise to inquire what arrangement has been made with regard to extension of remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Permission was given in the House to all persons who have spoken to extend their remarks. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because I regard it as a very unjust and unfair bill from the standpoint of the people for whom I especially speak, and it is also unfair and unjust in other particulars as relates to the whole people of the United States. My district is specially interested in this, and we think we know something about the facts embraced in this agreement, or this arrangement, because my district, on the northern boundary, joins Ontario and Manitoba. I have lived within a short distance of that line for more than 30 years, and have observed the difference in the conditions of employment and of production and prices on both sides of the line. I will not take time to go into a discussion of the proposition which has been advanced here by some of the alleged friends of the farmers that the prices of wheat are just as high in Canada as in the United States. I know absolutely from personal knowledge and experience that it is not so. They are mistaken, and there has been a difference on this side to the advantage of the farmers on wheat alone of more than 10 cents a bushel, and sometimes a great deal more, for many, many years.

I do not think we can take the time here to analyze the reasons for this. The principal reason is that the wheat that we raise in the Northwestern and boundary States is spring wheat, is hard wheat, and that is principally consumed in the United States to mix with other kinds of wheat so as to make a more valuable and strong flour for bread making, and it commands a higher price than soft wheat, and, therefore, commands a price that is very much above the price at Liverpool.

I will say, further, that it seems to me that this bill is unfair to the people at large, to the consumer in every occupation of life. It is strange to me that the Democratic Party has not discovered that they are on the wrong track so far as legislation for tariff reform is concerned in this instance. They are, so to speak, trying to reduce the tariff by raising it, for the reason that in this bill you are taking away the duty on the raw material, the price of which was higher by reason of a protected market at home, and you do not remove the manufacturer's differential, or you very slightly change it.

Now, it is self-evident that there are two ways of increasing the protection of the manufacturer by changing customs duties. One is by leaving the duty as it is on the manufactured article and reducing the duty on the imported raw material; the other by raising the duty on the finished article while leaving unchanged the duty on the raw material. When I first came here it was at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress. An extra session was called by the President to ratify the Cuban treaty. And I want to say right here that that was a treaty and not a pact or agreement which has no authority or validity in law. It was a treaty ratified by two-thirds of the Senate and printed in the statute books of the country, and we were called upon to put that into execution by proper revenue laws.

The Democrats were led by Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and Mr. De Armond. It was my first experience in this House, and I remember it as if it were yesterday. What was the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi? Why, to amend the bill, to carry the treaty into effect. But here you say this "pact" can not be amended. What was the amendment then proposed? It was to wipe out the differential of the Sugar Trust, which amounted to 1⅛ of a mill per pound—12½ cents upon 100 pounds. And they alleged in forcible and eloquent speeches that that 12½ cents on 100 pounds was the cause of the great monopoly, the Sugar Trust, having a strangle hold upon the Republican Party, and if we could wipe out the refiner's differential we would liberate the people of the United States from the grasp of the sugar monopoly. What a change has come over the spirit of our dreams! The leader of the Democratic Party comes up here now and proposes a differential of $1.25 a hundred, or 1¼ cents a pound, on beef and removes the duty entirely upon the raw material. Why, if it had been suggested to the Democratic floor leader at that time that we were to take off this duty on raw sugar entirely, thereby making the entire duty flow into the pockets of the Sugar Trust, he would have justly said that we were candidates for an insane asylum. And yet here is a proposition that is more than ten times as bad, because the differential is increased from 12½ cents per 100 pounds to $1.25 per 100 pounds on raw material absolutely free. Have you ever thought of that? The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] struck the keynote when he said this raised the duties of the Payne bill. Of course it does. It does not do it directly, but indirectly, by removing the duty on raw material all around.

And you do not seem to know it yet. I would like to have somebody debate the merits of this bill and answer this, because I have not heard any discussion of it on the floor so far. The carcass of a steer on the hoof, say, weighs 1,200 pounds, and when dressed it weighs 800 pounds. It costs $1 to slaughter that in the slaughterhouse. You can hire it done for that price. And here is a differential to the manufacturer of $10—1,000 per cent—10 times more than the total cost of production. What are you thinking about?

This bill was never prepared in the Committee on Ways and Means. It must have been prepared by some amateur clerks up in the department. Who can tell how many jokers there are in it? But the thing goes on. It is not meat alone. There is flour, as has been pointed out. There is 50 cents a barrel on flour, and the total tariff on the raw material is wiped off. And so it is with barley. The brewer gets his barley free, as does the maltster, but there is a duty on the beer and the malt. The effect of this is not to reduce duties, but to raise them, and you build a tariff wall around the manufacturers who are organizing trusts a mile high—higher than it has ever been before. It is a reward for combination, monopolistic combination, by the strength of which it is sought to rob the ultimate consumer in every walk of life. Cheap food, cheaper cost of living! Free raw material with duties on the finished product is revision downward, not for the consumer but for the trusts at the expense of the Treasury. You are tying us hand and foot and delivering us over to the meat trust and the flour trust and every other trust in the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, there is one remarkable thing that I have noticed in this debate, and that is that there is a dispute between gentlemen on that side and on this side as to whether this is a Republican or a Democratic measure. Why, bless your soul, it is neither one nor the other. It has all the faults of protection gone mad and of destructive free trade. It is the Democratic donkey, tail end first, and the rear end of the Republican elephant. [Laughter and applause.] That is what it is. It has all the faults of both sides and none of the merits. [Laughter.]

A great deal has been said to the effect that we can not amend or change this bill because, as has been said, it is a pact. There is something sacred about the word "pact." What is this agreement? Has anybody signed it? No. It is a verbal agreement, and the Canadian minister writes, "That is my understanding," and our Secretary of State says, "Yes; that is right; that is my understanding." It is not an instrument in writing, and yet they come in here and say it is so sacred that you can not change it by crossing a "t" or dotting an "i."

It is said in the letter of the Canadian ministers to the Secretary of State, "It is agreed that the desired tariff changes shall not take the formal shape of a treaty but that the Governments of the two countries will use their utmost efforts to bring about such changes by concurrent legislation at Washington and Ottawa." Both the President and the ministers knew that there could be no treaty because the treaty power—the President and two-thirds of the Senate—would not agree to any such proposition. Now while I contend that the action of the President in agreeing to use his "utmost efforts" to secure this legislation was outside and beyond the limitations of the Constitution which vests the legislative power in Congress and requires that all bills raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, yet I admit that the Canadian ministers were differently situated as to their Government, and for this reason: They, like Great Britain, are under the parliamentary system where there is almost complete merger of executive and legislative power in the House of Commons. The premier is a member and leader of the House, and virtually chief executive at the same time. The ministers of the Canadian Government who occupy this dual position might with propriety make this agreement, while on account of our Constitutional limitations the President seems to be without legal authority to do so.

While the President may recommend to our consideration such measures as he shall "judge necessary and expedient," he may not use the appointing power to persuade us, or his power to call or adjourn Congress to secure this or any other proposed legislation.

If he has authority to make such an agreement regarding trade and to carry it out in this manner, he would have the same right as to other subjects—such as the liquor traffic, marriage and divorce, child labor, strikes, and so forth. Would not the inevitable result be that our fundamental law would be so changed as to give the President not only the negative in legislation but the initiative also, and the power of the Presidency increased at the expense of the Congress? Laws would be submitted to us complete in form, and all we would have the right to do would be to say yes or no.

It is a tendency to merge both the legislative and executive power in the President, a tendency directly opposite to the change which has gradually taken place under the British Constitution, where the executive power has been merged in the House of Commons.

The one augments the power of the people, the other leads to autocracy.

The letter of the Canadian ministers speaks of the "Governments of the two countries," just as if it were a treaty, and it is not even preliminary to a treaty. While the ministers may be the "Government" of the Dominion, it is incorrect to speak of the President as the "Government," except when he is executing the treaty-making power, which confessedly was not intended. The object of this agreement was legislation by Congress and Parliament and not a treaty.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. FINLEY. Where does the gentleman think the President stands on this proposition?

Mr. STEENERSON. The President has evidently been misled, and he has succeeded in deluding the Democrats more than they have ever been deluded before, and more than I hope they will ever be deluded again. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Where and how did this bill originate? According to the President's message, it originated when the question of enforcing the maximum and minimum provisions of the Payne law against Canada came up. The first words of the reciprocity message reads as follows:

In my annual message of December 6, 1910, I stated that the policy of broader and closer trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, which was initiated in the adjustment of the maximum and minimum provisions of the tariff act of August 5, 1909, had proved mutually beneficial and that it justified further efforts for the readjustment of the commercial relations of the two countries.

The maximum and minimum provision is one that levies a 25 per cent higher rate of duty on commodities coming from a country that discriminates against our goods and refuses to treat us as fairly as the most favored nations are treated. Apparently, Canada refused to so treat us, but our Government did not enforce the penalty required by the act of Congress in question, but began to negotiate. It was a delicate situation, no doubt, but these Canadian friends of ours persisted in refusing to relieve us from discriminatory treatment in their markets.

Here is what the Canadian minister says of the origin of this matter and what happened.

Referring to his first meeting with Mr. Taft in connection with the operation of the maximum and minimum tariff imposed by the Payne bill, among other things Mr. Fielding stated the following, as given on page 2500 of the official record:

[Extract from speech made by Hon. W. S. Fielding, minister of finance of the Dominion of Canada, before the House of Commons, as reported in the House of Commons Debates, under date of Thursday, January 26, 1911.]

I will frankly say that I do not think Mr. Taft ever desired to impose the maximum tariff upon the products of Canada. The misfortune was that Congress had imposed the tariff. It was not a question of Mr. Taft doing it, as Congress had put that tariff on and declared that on and after a given date the products of all countries not exempted by special action of the President should become subject to the maximum tariff. The maximum tariff existed and was coming into operation in a few days. It was not a question of Mr. Taft putting it on, but of Mr. Taft being induced to take it off, as he had the power to do. * * * As I have already said, it was not a question of putting on the maximum tariff, it was a question of taking it off, and I found that the President of the United States was willing to take it off, if we could give him some decent excuse to do so under the terms of the American tariff law. We made a few changes, a few concessions of no earthly importance, so small and trifling that I am sure hardly any of us in the House could remember to-day what they were. But they served the purpose; they were enough to give Mr. Taft the reason and excuse he desired; and, accordingly, he issued his proclamation that Canada should not be placed under the disadvantage of the maximum tariff, which, if applied, would undoubtedly have done harm on both sides, most certainly to large business interests in Canada. Out of the negotiations at that time have sprung the larger negotiations of a more recent date.

I think by this time the farmers of the United States regret there ever was a maximum and minimum provision in the tariff law. That the opening up free of a market of 92,000,000 people—the greatest and most profitable market in the world—should be the reward of the Canadians for refusing to give us the most-favored-nations treatment will go down as the most remarkable diplomatic achievement in all history. After this, is it any wonder that some people say that the absorption of the United States by the British Empire is far more likely than our annexation of Canada?

We have had experience on the point that it is not every "revision downward" that benefits the people. Did free hides lower the price of shoes? No; not at all. What did it do? It lowered the farm price of hides all over the country, and every farmer in the land can tell you so. What else did it do? It deprived the United States Treasury of the two or three million dollars a year it had theretofore collected on imported cattle hides and turned it into the pockets of the shoe and leather trust, just exactly as this reciprocity arrangement will first reduce the farm price of all that the farmer produces and deprive the Treasury of the five or six million dollars a year heretofore received from duties on Canadian imports and turn it all over to combinations and trusts in this country. Our experience was exactly the same when we had a reciprocity treaty with Hawaii, whereby their sugar was admitted free. The Treasury lost the revenue and the people paid just exactly the same for sugar as they did before.

According to the logic of the advocates of this bill, that man in New York who invented the springs to put in the scales of the customhouse so as to underweigh the sugar imported was really engaged in a meritorious work; he was trying to reduce the cost of living by getting in cheaper sugar. He certainly reduced the duties; he revised the tariff downward—to the Sugar Trust. The trouble was that the trust forgot to pass the reduced price on to the consumer. He was engaged in doing exactly what this bill proposes—increasing the difference between the price at which the manufacturers' raw material and his finished product can be brought in.

The representatives of manufacturing interests in the East are again learnedly arguing that this pact will not injure the farmer, but the farmers think they know their own business as well as anybody. The device of assuming the guise of farmers' friend for an ulterior purpose will not work, for that trick can be played only once in an evening. To show just what the farmers think of reciprocity, I will insert in the RECORD resolutions passed in a mass meeting in Kittson County, right on the boundary line of Canada, and a mass convention held recently at St. Paul, and also a letter from Justus C. Berg, one of our most prominent and representative farmers.

I say to you as earnestly as I can, that the injurious effects of this law go beyond the comprehension of most of us. It strikes at the industries of 30,000,000 people, and I believe eventually it will increase instead of diminish the cost of living to every man, woman, and child in the United States. How can a Congress elected by the people enact such a law in the exercise of their unbiased judgment? Well might we exclaim—

O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason—if they will approve so monstrous a proposition as this. [Applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX.

A BIG MEETING—FARMERS AND BUSINESS MEN HOLD BIG ANTICANADIAN RECIPROCITY MEETING.

HALLOCK, MINN., April 15, 1911.

The mass meeting called by President P. H. Konzen, of the Hallock Commercial Club, last Saturday to draft resolutions against the pending Canadian reciprocity and to elect delegates to attend the State meeting at St. Paul, was probably one of the most enthusiastic and well attended public meetings ever brought together in Hallock. Fully 200 representative farmers from different parts of the county were present as delegates, and with the number that attended from town, the courthouse was crowded full. Though nonpolitical, the gathering was made up of men of different political ranks, and for once our Republican friends admitted that the pending Republican Canadian reciprocity pact was one of the most barefaced pieces of class legislation ever attempted upon an intelligent people, and they stood shoulder to shoulder with Democrats in denouncing it as unpatriotic, unjust, and discriminatory—sacrificing the interests of the agricultural masses to the insatiable greed of the capitalistic and manufacturing classes. The only objectionable feature about the whole meeting was that the committee on resolutions, in commending the stand taken by our United States Senators and Congressmen, either willfully or unintentionally left out the name of Congressman W. S. HAMMOND, the only Democratic Member from Minnesota, who worked as hard as any other Minnesotan for the defeat of the bill. P. H. Konzen was chosen presiding officer of the meeting and C. J. Estlund was chosen secretary, and the two were elected delegates to the St. Louis meeting, which met at the old Capitol Building last Tuesday, and, according to the Minneapolis Tribune of the 11th, we note that Mr. Konzen had been chosen by the St. Paul convention a member of the delegation whose duty it will be to carry the convention's protest to Congress at Washington, D. C. Here are the resolutions:

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTIONS.

We, the people of Kittson County, Minn., in mass meeting assembled, believing that Canadian reciprocity, as proposed by the McCall or administration bill now pending before the United States Congress, is unjust and unequal, in that it brings the products of the farm into direct competition with like products of agricultural Canada, while providing no compensatory benefits in any of the articles of manufacture which we buy and consume, do hereby most earnestly protest against the passage of the said reciprocity pact, and unanimously unite in voicing our denunciation of the said act as unpatriotic, unjust, diabolical, and discriminatory, sacrificing the interests of the agricultural masses of the country to the insatiable greed and predatory aggrandizement of the capitalistic and manufacturing classes. And in furtherance of said protest, be it

Resolved, That we regard the said reciprocity treaty as inimical to our best interests and destructive of the only vestige of benefit that the farmer has ever received, or ever expects to receive, from the protective system which he has patriotically helped to maintain for what he conceived to be for the best interests of our common country.

Resolved, That we view, in the passage of the Canadian reciprocity act, a deliberate purpose to discriminate against the farming interests and to sacrifice its rights to the Moloch of corporate greed.

Resolved, That we regard the said act as a direct slap at the rural districts, and therefore shall hold any Member of the United States Congress who supports the same as hostile to our interests and our cause.

Resolved, That we believe that the large cities of our State—St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth—in their strenuous efforts in behalf of the passage of the said reciprocity act, evince a reckless disregard for the rights of the toiling millions upon the broad farming domain of this and those other Western States whose wealth of golden grain and other products, pouring in a torrential stream into their laps, has contributed in no small degree to their prosperity and greatness; and that we view their zeal and activity in that behalf as an exhibition of sheer selfishness and without palliation in rhyme or reason other than that of local benefit at the expense of the rural interests.

Resolved, That we commend the stand taken by our United States Senators, Hon. KNUTE NELSON and Hon. M. E. CLAPP, and by our Representatives, the honorable Messrs. STEENERSON, VOLSTEAD, DAVIS, LINDBERGH, and ANDERSON in opposition to this most unjust and one-sided measure, and we most earnestly urge them to a continuance of such opposition, to the end that the said proposed bill may either be entirely defeated or at least so modified as to yield compensatory benefits to the agricultural interests of the country, for the protection of which they alone, as a class, are sought to be deprived.

Resolved, That the secretary of this meeting be instructed to forward to each of our United States Senators and to each Member of Congress from this State, as well as to the chairman of the mass meeting held at the old capitol building in the city of St. Paul on Tuesday, the 11th day of April, A. D. 1911, a copy of these resolutions.

RESOLUTION OF PROTEST.

We, farmers and business men of Minnesota in mass meeting assembled, do most earnestly and sincerely protest against the ratification by Congress of the pending treaty with Canada in its present form.

In doing so we hereby announce and publish the following reasons:

First. That the treaty is unfair, unjust, and discriminating against the agricultural interests of the United States, giving these interests practically nothing in return for what it deprives them of.

Second. That it will inure to the disadvantage, loss, and suffering of our producers without any prospect of cheaper manufactured products to the consumer.

Third. That the removal of the duty on wheat will accrue solely to the benefit of the miller; that of barley to the brewer; that of flaxseed to the linseed mills; and that of live stock, hogs, poultry, and dairy products to the packers and middlemen, and, while not benefiting the consumer, will mean a great loss to the producers.

Fourth. It creates an unfair competition, inasmuch as it will compel our farmers to compete in our own markets with the cheaply produced products of alien competitors. We contend that our home market belongs, in the first instance, to our own citizens.

Fifth. This pact, if agreed to, will retard and set back the progress toward a higher and better standard of farm life which has become so noticeable during the recent prosperous times; it will tend to bring on again that struggle for existence so well remembered by our pioneer farmers, a struggle in which many went under; it will lessen the opportunities for a better education of our farmers' children, and thus encourage them in leaving the farm.

DECLARES PACT WILL CAUSE LOSS.

Sixth. It will lessen the purchasing capacity of our American producers to the extent of millions of dollars annually by depriving them of a legitimate and fair price for their products. All of this will represent a corresponding loss to the commercial interests of our country, as the farmer's profit invariably finds its way into all the channels of trade. Our commercial and manufacturing interests stand to lose as much in this way as they will gain by the expansion of their business.

Seventh. Our American farmers, by their thrift, energy, and frugality, have made this country what it is; they have made it possible for the great commercial interests to become wealthy and powerful. Without the farmer this would have been impossible. In view of this our commercial interests should now stand by the farmer. To do otherwise lays them open to the charge of commercial greed and selfishness.

Eighth. The term "reciprocity" as applied to the Canadian treaty is a misnomer. Reciprocity means an equitable trade or exchange between two countries of products which one country produces and the other does not, or which it produces only in insufficient quantities. We produce everything in this country that is produced in Canada.

Ninth. It constitutes an agreement made secretly and without regard to any settled policies of our tariff laws. It means free trade for the farmer and protection for the manufacturer, and as such is discrimination in its rankest form.

ASSERTS RIGHT TO HOME MARKET.

Tenth. That in trading off our home market of over 90,000,000 people, a market that is and has been abundantly supplied by our own producers, a market that has been built up by American thrift and frugality, and which by every inherent right and heritage belongs to our producers, for that of 8,000,000 Canadians, with its doubtful increased advantages to commercial and manufacturing interests, would not only be unfair and unjust to our own producers, but foolish and reprehensible.

Eleventh. This proposed treaty, when divested of its sentimental features, can and will appeal only to those who are selfishly interested and who expect to gain thereby. As a whole, it will be a damage rather than a benefit to our country. In its present form it should not be ratified.

Twelfth. We repudiate the action of President Taft, large manufacturing concerns, chambers of commerce, and the management of the Great Northern Railway in attempting to force the so-called reciprocity agreement through Congress without giving the people at large an opportunity to give it due consideration or to express their opinions. We regret exceedingly that the city press has failed to give publicity to both sides of this most important question.

BLAMES THE MIDDLEMEN.

Thirteenth. The proposed pact would not reduce the cost of living. It would not benefit the laboring man, the mechanic, or artisan in the great cities, as the exorbitant prices paid by them for produce is not occasioned by the price received by the farmer, but is the result of the excessive charges made by the railroads and middlemen. The farmer only receives 35 per cent of the price paid by the consumer, while the transportation companies and middlemen receive the other 65.

Fourteenth. We hereby express our thanks to all those newspapers of our State who in this controversy have risen above considerations of selfishness and have defended the farming interests against this threatening danger, and we mention expressly the Northwestern Agriculturist, the Farm, Stock, and Home, and the Farmer, and we also thank all members of our legislature and other citizens who have interested themselves in calling this meeting.

Fifteenth. We urge on all our citizens who are in favor of fair play and equality before the law to make continuous and effective agitation against this treaty.

Sixteenth. That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress.

HENDRUM, MINN., April 11, 1911.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I feel moved to address you and thank you for the stand you took last session of Congress in opposition to the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and hope you will do all within your power to prevent its passage this session.

In my capacity as an officer of a farmers' organization covering three of the Northwestern States and other local cooperative concerns I have come in contact with many representative farmers.

I was deeply impressed with the spontaneous opposition the introduction of this Canadian agreement created. This opposition is nearly, if not entirely, unanimous among the farmers of the Northwest. The reasons for this opposition are common and identical. And I can assure you that no mending or changing of the reciprocity bill, even to absolute free trade with Canada, will change the common conviction that this measure is being forced upon the farmers as an excuse for conditions for which they can not justly be held responsible.

The sentiment is so rapidly gaining force that should this bill or any other bill placing agricultural products on the free list pass, the only consistent course for the farmers to take is to stand for absolute free trade with the entire world, and compel, if they can, this country to resort to direct taxation.

It is conceded by all parties that the agricultural sections of the Central and Northwestern States have been the manufacturers' stanchest supporters in building and supporting the policy of high protection. Is this our reward? If so, we have come to the parting of the ways. We have stood for protection in the past, and have been the least benefited. Now that the time has come when we to a limited degree share its benefits, are they to be taken away from us?

Production on land already under cultivation can easily be multiplied by three if farming is sufficiently profitable to warrant the necessary preparation and investment of capital. I believe with others that have studied agricultural conditions carefully that the United States will be self-supporting for generations to come if farming should prove sufficiently profitable to be attractive.

No vocation, or profession either, attains a high degree of efficiency unless its remuneration is commensurate with capital and energy expended. Nor are the American farmers an exception to this rule. To make farming attractive it must have the means to make it comfortable, and that makes for contentment—in other words, share the Nation's prosperity.

Economists and sociologists view with serious apprehension the movement from the farm to the larger cities. The bill in question, or any other legislation adverse to the farmers, can only augment this movement. There may be a few of us so situated that we need not continue in an unprofitable business, but what per cent of the farmers are so situated?

The only excuse offered in introducing or recommending this Canadian reciprocity agreement was that it would reduce the cost of living. But have the consumers of farm products any assurance that their wages will not be correspondingly reduced? If the farmer suffers, will it not sooner or later react on the city laborers? The adjustment will surely follow when the country boys offer themselves on the labor market in competition with others that sell their labor.

These are a few points the farmers would like Congress to consider carefully before they pass a bill that is unpopular to nearly one-third of the country's voters.

If we can assist you in any way, you have but to address us.

Yours, respectfully,

JUSTUS C. BERGH.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the agreement or informal treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada which it is intended to ratify on the part of the United States by this bill proposes to change the economic and commercial relations of the two countries upon the basis of alleged mutual and reciprocal advantage. Stripped of its sentimental considerations, it presents a purely business proposition of whether or not the commissioners have made an intelligent bargain.

Briefly stated, for the purpose of the determination of this question, the bill presents a proposed reciprocal free list, which includes only the raw products of the farm, such as wheat, oats, rye, barley, flax, butter, and cheese, designated as Schedule A, and a proposed reciprocal dutiable list which contains certain specified articles of manufacture, designated as Schedule B.

The proposition is not a new one, and fortunately may, at least in part, be determined by the light that is furnished by the experience of the past, and it is worth while in this connection to consider the trade relations which have heretofore existed between the two countries.

In 1854 the Democratic Party, flushed with victory, as now, presented a proposed reciprocal agreement between the two countries for the assent of Congress which provided for free trade between the two countries in natural products. This treaty was identical with the free list proposed in this agreement, with the exception that it included flour and breadstuffs; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; hides; stone and marble; ores and metals; lumber of all kinds; rice; gypsum; unmanufactured tobacco; and rags, and in this respect offered to the consumer and the farmer some advantages which this treaty does not.

It will be noted that in the treaty of 1854 not an article the value of which had been enhanced by manufacture was included in the agreement.

The contemporaneous statesmanship of that period is unanimous as to the disastrous effects upon the commerce of the United States of the treaty of 1854, and upon its final abrogation in 1866 the resolution providing for its abrogation was supported by such men as John Sherman, of Ohio; Senators Morrill, of Maine; Chandler, of Michigan; Doolittle, of Wisconsin; Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts; and many others. Manufacturing New England was among the first to demand the abrogation of the treaty.

The resolution to abrogate the treaty passed in the Senate by a vote of 38 to 0. In the debate upon the resolution to abrogate the treaty Senator Foote, of Vermont, said:

I believe it to be very generally conceded that while this reciprocity treaty, so denominated, has proved highly beneficial to the interests of the people of the British Provinces, and has contributed very largely to their interest and prosperity, it has at the same time proved injurious and prejudicial to the interest and prosperity of the people of the American States. The very title of the treaty itself is a misnomer. There is nothing reciprocal about it; there is nothing reciprocal in its operation; it produces no reciprocity of benefits between the two Governments. It is beneficial to one only of the contracting parties and injures the other. Such are the practical results of the opinion of the American people, who now, after an experience of its effects for 10 years, demand as with one voice the abrogation of a contract which they regard as partial, unjust, inequitable, and one-sided, as soon as it can be done through the forms prescribed in the treaty itself.

I propose now to consider some of the effects of the treaty of 1854 upon our commerce. In the four years immediately preceding the going into effect of the treaty our importations from Canada, free of duty, amounted to $4,107,392. Those paying duty amounted to $15,002,034, or nearly four times greater. In the four years immediately succeeding the commencement of the treaty our imports from Canada, free of duty, increased to $59,419,926, while those subject to duty decreased to $2,150,394, or 1 in 28, a total importation of $61,570,320, as against $19,110,026 in the four years preceding the treaty. On the other hand, our exports to Canada dwindled from $20,771,691 in 1855 to $15,243,834 in 1866, and in the same period Canada's exports to us increased from $12,000,000 to $46,000,000, of which $25,000,000 was farm products. In this connection Senator Collomer, speaking in favor of the abrogation of the treaty, said:

The amount received by them (Canada) under the treaty free of duty, since it went into operation, was $73,000,000, and the amount received by us from them $115,000,000—and yet we had at that time 30,000,000 people to produce, while Canada had but 3,000,000.

When the treaty began, upon all exports and imports between the two countries, we had a balance of trade of $8,000,000, which, at the expiration of the treaty, had turned into a balance of $30,000,000 against us.

Immediately upon the abrogation of the treaty of 1854 the statesmen of Canada began again to knock at our doors for the admission of her farm products, beseeching us for a resumption of reciprocal relations in the products of the farm, but its disastrous effects were still fresh in our memory, and up to the present time we have steadfastly refused to be drawn into any proposition looking to the free admission of the natural products of the Dominion.

President Grant, in his first administration, declined to consider such a proposition, giving as his reason that the advantages of such a treaty would be wholly in favor of the British producers, excepting in the case of a few engaged in transportation. In his second administration he offered to make a new treaty which should include the free admission into Canada of a large number of manufactured products, but the Dominion officials, adhering then as now to the policy of protection of her manufacturing industries, refused to make a treaty upon that basis.

Again, in the administration of President Harrison, the matter of a reciprocal arrangement contemplating the free admission of natural products was considered, and, in a message to the Congress, President Harrison denounced the proposition in the following language:

A reciprocity treaty limited to the exchange of natural products would have been such only in form. The benefits of such a treaty would have inured almost wholly to Canada. Previous experiments on this line had been unsatisfactory to this Government. A treaty to be reciprocal in fact and of mutual advantage must necessarily have embraced an important list of manufactured articles and have secured to the United States a free or favored introduction of those articles into Canada and against the world.

In another message to Congress referring to reciprocity between the two countries, he said:

The conference developed the fact that the Canadian Government was only prepared to offer to the United States in exchange for the concessions asked the admission of natural products. This admission, which was foreseen, necessarily terminated the conference upon this question. The benefits of an exchange of natural products would be almost wholly with the people of Canada.

The Republican platform of 1904 provided:

We have extended widely our foreign markets, and we believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for their future extension, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected consistent with the principles of protection and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry.

It will be noted from the excerpts which I have read that the policy of the American statesmanship of the past has been to decline the overtures of the Canadian Government looking to reciprocity in natural products, in view of the disastrous results to our commerce and the experiences of the treaty of 1854, unless our concessions in the opening of the American market to the natural products of Canada were met with a reciprocal concession on the part of Canada providing for the free or favored admission of our manufactured products into the Dominion. And that, so far as the Republican Party is concerned, it has never contemplated reciprocity with Canada unless it could be effectuated without injury to any American industry, including agriculture.

The present treaty attempts to anticipate the objection that no reciprocal advantages are offered to our manufacturing industries, by injecting into this agreement what is denominated a reciprocal dutiable list and described as Schedule B. An examination of this schedule, however, discloses the fact that the shadow has been substituted for the substance. It discloses further that no attempt was made to so arrange these schedules of the treaty that it would permit the entry into Canada upon equal terms of any of the manufactured products of this country which compete with the industry of the Dominion or with importations from Great Britain. On the contrary, Schedule B is a compromise between the duty upon specified articles provided by the Payne-Aldrich bill and the duties provided by the general tariff laws of Canada.

But in no case is the reduction in duty sufficient to warrant the assumption that any substantial benefit or increased trade will inure to the American manufacturer. The unquestioned statements of the Canadian statesmen upon this proposition are convincing.

As late as 1903 Sir John Charlton, in an address to the Canadian Parliament, said:

> Something must be done to change the trade conditions that exist between the United States and Canada. Free trade in natural products would afford a reasonable adjustment. Nothing short of this will do, and this condition of free trade of natural products must be granted by the United States without a solitary concession from Canada further than she has already made. We can not afford any more.

How close the pending agreement approximates the Canadian ideal I shall make plain later on in an analysis of the trade relations between the two countries.

In addressing the Canadian House of Commons on March 7 of this year, speaking on the reciprocity agreement, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> We (Canada) are above all an agricultural people. Our chief wealth is the growth of these products of the Temperate Zone. * * * I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made is simply to get better prices for the products of the Canadian farmer. * * * Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. We have some yet, but it is not as large as it ought to be, because everybody knows that it has been constantly retarded by the embargo put upon it some 20 years ago or so, and, therefore, if we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise in Great Britain there is a ready market in the United States. * * * It is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than in natural products, but our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting the agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

To my mind this indicates beyond any question that however the treaty may be regarded on this side of the line, on the Canadian side of the line it is regarded as relating only to natural products and as making no concession whatever to our manufacturing interests. To what extent a free exchange of natural products is reciprocal in its advantages to the United States can be gathered from the tables submitted in connection with the message of the President of the United States, January 21, 1911, in transmitting the treaty to Congress, from which I take the figures which follow:

During the fiscal year 1910 the American tariff upon wheat was 25 cents a bushel. Canada's tariff upon wheat was 12½ cents a bushel. In spite of the fact that our tariff as against the Canadian wheat was twice that of the Canadian duty upon American wheat, Canada imported from us only 55,139 bushels in 1910, while we imported from Canada 2,317,191 bushels, which does not take into consideration the 12,000,000 bushels which were brought into the United States and turned into flour and then shipped back into Canada under the drawback and bond provision of the Payne-Aldrich law, without the payment of any duty, and which, of course, under this treaty would come into competition with the wheat produced in this country.

The tariff upon butter in the United States was 6 cents per pound. The Canadian tariff was 4 cents per pound. Notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian tariff was 2 cents less than ours, we exported to Canada but 61,081 pounds, while Canada exported to the United States, paying a tariff of 6 cents per pound, 980,036 pounds.

Our tariff on cheese was 6 cents per pound. Canada's tariff was 3 cents per pound. We exported to Canada 215,681 pounds. Canada exported to us 163,355 pounds. This, however, tells but a small portion of the story. In the same year Canada exported to Great Britain 164,090,903 pounds of cheese and 5,353,770 pounds of butter. What will be the result when this butter and cheese is diverted to the nearer market of the United States, as it will be when these articles are placed on the free list?

Taking the figures submitted by the President in connection with his message transmitting the treaty to Congress, the articles which are now dutiable but which will be free when exported into Canada from the United States under Schedule A amount to $21,957,605, while the articles now dutiable and which it is proposed to make free under the agreement coming from Canada amount to $39,811,560, a balance of trade in Canada's favor of $17,653,955. This, of course, is applying the terms of the treaty to the trade between the two countries as if it had been in force during the year 1910. When you add to this balance of trade the tremendous amount of natural products of Canada's 800,000,000 acres of farm land which will seek the nearer American market under free trade, it becomes at once apparent that the balance of trade in Canada's favor under the free-trade provisions of Schedule A must reach tremendous proportions and will constantly increase.

Having disposed of the advantage which will inure to Canada by the adoption of this agreement, it becomes necessary to determine what reciprocal advantage, if any, will inure to the benefit of the United States.

The determination of this question involves an inquiry into the effect of the treaty upon our manufacturers, our consumers, and our farmers. It will be remembered from what I have said heretofore that Canada's position in the past has been to decline to consider any proposition looking to the admission into Canada of our manufactured products. I think I shall be able to show that she has adhered strictly to that policy in the pending agreement.

Immediately upon the abrogation of the treaty of 1854, and beginning with 1866, our exports to Canada greatly increased. In that year our exports amounted to $28,794,000; in 1903 they had increased to $137,600,000; in 1910 they reached the enormous total of $239,000,000. Of the latter amount, nearly $100,000,000 consisted of manufactured products. Our exports to Canada are 56 per cent of her total imports from all countries. Our balance of trade against Canada in 1910 amounted to $141,000,000, proving conclusively, to my mind, that Canada is now buying in our market nearly 60 per cent of all that she buys from all foreign countries, including Great Britain, and that she prefers to buy of us. There is no reason to assume that she will buy more under the proposed arrangement; but if this treaty had been in force at the beginning of the fiscal year 1910, out of the $133,000,000 worth of goods subject to duty which we shipped into Canada in 1910 only $25,000,000 worth would have received the benefit of reduced duties provided in the law, and these would have received the benefits of an average reduction of duty of only 17 per cent. While our manufacturers of carpets, clothing, collars and cuffs, cotton print, sheets, telephone and telegraph instruments and fixtures, firearms, furniture, window glass, gloves, knit goods, leather goods, leather beltings, sewing machines, boots and shoes, silk goods, typewriters, ribbons, velvets, woolen blankets, flannels, cloths used in the production of men's clothing, granite, marble, slag, mill machinery, scales, organs, pianos, harness, harness hardware, and a hundred and one of our great lines of production in the United States would still have been obliged, and will still be obliged, should this treaty become operative, to pay the duties which they have heretofore had to pay when these goods were exported to Canada. They not only get no reduction of duty upon their products, but must compete with the products of Great Britain imported into Canada under a preferential tariff of 33⅓ per cent. How much the markets of Canada will be opened by this agreement to the manufactured products of the United States may be imagined when we stop to consider that upon the few articles mentioned in the so-called reciprocal dutiable list in the agreement the average reduction of duty made by Canada on products of American manufacture is 17 per cent, while the average reduction made by the United States upon the manufactures of Canada is 39 per cent.

How small a concession has been made to the manufacturers of the United States may be gleaned from the fact that while the total trade between the two countries amounted to $326,963,231 in 1910, the amount of that trade which would have been affected by the reduction in this bill amounts to $33,391,952, or in fact slightly in excess of 10 per cent of the total trade between the two countries. This so-called concession, it seems to me, hardly justifies us in subjecting our farmers to the competition not only to the constantly increasing production of Canada's 800,000,000 acres, but as well to the competition of the $100,000,000 in value of the surplus farm products of Canada which now seek the markets of England, but which under free trade with the United States must inevitably turn to the free-trade market in this country.

We come now to the consideration of the effect of the treaty upon the consumer of this country. President Taft in his message disposes of that feature of the case in the following language:

> I do not wish to hold out the prospect that the unrestricted interchange of food products will greatly and at once reduce their cost to the people of this country.

Mr. Taft might have gone further than that. He would have stated the truth had he said that with the exception of one or two articles, such as butter and eggs, which are consumed in their natural state, there is not the slightest ground to be found in the treaty for the belief that the consumer would get any benefit whatever from its provisions. He might have said that as far as the consumer is concerned it perpetuates all of the inequalities and injustices of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

While the agreement does remove the duty on wheat it retains a duty upon flour. While it removes the duty upon cattle, hogs, and sheep it still retains a duty of 1¼ cents per pound upon fresh and salted meats, bacon, and ham, and it may be confidently asserted that while the duties upon these manufactured food products have been slightly reduced, taking into consideration the fact that the raw products out of which they are manufactured are upon the free list, the duties imposed by this bill are actually higher, from the standpoint of the consumer, than were the duties of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, and provide a greater rate of protection to the manufacturers.

It must be remembered that duties upon manufactured products are of two kinds—a compensatory duty which is intended to compensate the manufacturer for the duty which he is obliged to pay for the raw products contained in the manufacture when they are imported from a foreign country and a protective duty upon the manufactured articles themselves. The latter is called the differential duty.

Under the Payne-Aldrich law the duty upon wheat was 25 cents per bushel. It takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make 1 barrel of flour. So that in order to compensate the miller for the duty upon the wheat in the flour it is necessary to impose a tariff upon the barrel of flour of four and one-half times 25 cents, or $1.12. So far the miller has had no protection whatever to cover the difference, if any, of the cost of making the flour. The actual tariff imposed by the Payne bill upon the barrel of flour was 25 per cent ad valorem. The average price of the flour imported from Canada to the United States in 1910 was $5 per barrel, making a specific tariff upon a barrel of flour of $1.25. Taking from this $1.25 of actual duty imposed the $1.12 which represents the compensatory duty on the wheat in the flour leaves an actual protection to the miller of 13 cents per barrel.

Now, then, under the proposed reciprocity agreement wheat is on the free list, so that it is unnecessary to compensate the miller for any duty upon wheat, and it becomes at once apparent that the 50 cents per barrel imposed upon flour by the agreement is a purely protective duty and is nearly four times as great as the protection afforded the miller under the Payne law. Indeed, the tariff of 50 cents a barrel is more than twice the total cost of manufacturing a barrel of flour in this country.

This situation is not confined to flour. The same demonstration could be made in the case of meats, bacon, and ham, and all other manufactured products considered in the agreement, which are manufactured in whole or in part from the products of agriculture. It is a fitting monument to the sagacity of the Canadian commissioners that in this agreement they have so arranged the duties that they (Canadians) can ship the cattle, hogs, and sheep raised upon the cheap and fertile lands of that empire of the Northwest into the United States without the payment of any duty whatever, but that when our packers and our millers have manufactured them into beef, hams, bacon, and mutton, they can not sell these manufactured products in Canada except upon paying a duty of 1¼ cents a pound, but in selling to the American consumer they still get the benefit of the duty as against any competition from Canada.

There is no great amount of comfort for the consumer in the placing of the products of agriculture upon the free list, as it has been ages since the human race has been accustomed to eat the raw product of the farm in its natural state. And it is worth notice that the same duty which prevents the American miller and the American packer from shipping his product into Canada prevents the American consumer from getting one cent of reduction in the price of these products.

I come now to the consideration of the effect of the agreement upon the agricultural sections of this country. I do not consider it last because I consider it less important than the others, for I consider it the most important feature of the entire proposition.

I remember when as a boy I heard the great Republicans of State and Nation telling the farmers of the benefits they had derived and would derive from the policy of protection upon farm products. You have been telling them this for 40 years. Now you propose to tell them that they never needed any protection and do not need it now. You expect them to believe you, because, forsooth, you have been lying to them for 40 years. Whatever others may do in this situation, I do not propose to be a party to the deception. I am convinced that the farmer has derived a benefit from protection upon his product in the past, and I am unwilling that these products should be placed upon the free list now without any reciprocal or compensatory advantages whatever. I am opposed to placing the farmers' products upon the free list without any investigation of the effect of placing them there and without any demonstration of the propriety and justice of doing so.

I have always had a great deal of confidence in that saying of the great emancipator, so often and so unctiously displayed in the Republican campaign textbooks of the past:

> I do not know much about the tariff, but I do know that when we buy our goods in foreign countries we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money, but when we buy our goods in this country we keep both the goods and the money.

And I apply that doctrine alike to the farmer and the manufacturer to the country merchant and the jobber. In fact, the experience, not only of this country, but of all countries of long-established prosperity—such countries as France and Germany—demonstrates beyond the power of any present consideration to abrogate it the proposition that protection to be effectual must commence with protection to the farmer.

The last platform of the Republican Party provided:

> The aim and purpose of the Republican policy being not only to preserve, without excessive duties, the security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wage-workers of this country—demonstrating conclusively that up to 1908 we had not abandoned the theory of protecting the products of the farm. That protection to be effectual must so limit the supply and consequently affect the price that the farmer shall be able to maintain a balance of trade in his favor against the world. In other words, it must so regulate the competition of foreign countries that the farmer shall be able to sell his product at such a price and buy what he uses in his business at such a price that he will always have a balance with which he can improve his farm, educate himself and his family, preserve the fertility of his soil, and improve his methods of cultivation. This is the basis of the prosperity of not only the farmer, but the Nation. You may dig deep in the well of memory, you may go back far in the pages of the history of the world, and you will find that the prosperity of nations has been in a large measure the result of the prosperity of the farmer.

You propose to maintain this prosperity by compelling the farmer to sell his product in a free-trade market in competition with one of the greatest agricultural sections in the world and to buy his goods in a highly protected market.

Now, it is claimed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that the benefits which the farmer receives from protection is an indirect benefit, arising from the larger employment and higher wages of the laborer and the larger production of the factory under protection, but I do not understand the philosophy that concludes that the farmer's direct protection should be reduced because he has an indirect protection.

The very process which removes the direct protection decreases the indirect benefit by decreasing the purchasing power of the farmers, and consequently reducing the production and wages of the employees of the factory.

It might be pertinent to inquire in this connection where it is that the prosperity expert gets his facts. Does he go to the factory and inquire what men are employed, and at what wages? No. He goes out to the farm and learns that the crops are well put in, that the weather conditions are good, that there is no prospect of drought, that the chinch bugs have not devastated the crop, and he comes back and makes the report, and the factory owner increases his product, raises the wages of his men 5 per cent, and adds 20 per cent to the price of his goods, because he knows that this year the farmer will have the money to buy a new pair of felt boots, a new overcoat, build a new hog house, and buy his wife a new spring bonnet.

He goes out again next year and he finds that in one section there has been too much rain and that the black rust has attacked the crops, that the grasshopper has devastated the fields, and the prospects are for a lean year in agriculture. He comes back and makes his report. The factory owner curtails his production, shortens the hours of his men, because he knows that this year the farmer will have no felt boots, will use his last year's overcoat, that he will make last year's hog house do still another year, and that the farmer's wife will wear last year's styles.

Canada is preeminently a country of protection.

Under that policy 184 factories with a combined American capital of $233,000,000 have been established. The logic of the situation does not lead me to conclude that she is now relinquishing any part of the policy which has enabled her to bring about a situation which must be so gratifying to her. She is not relinquishing under this agreement one iota of protection which she has afforded to her manufacturers in the past. We must not forget that the protection afforded by this agreement is ample to protect her industries.

Canada to-day is adopting the identical policy which we adopted 50 years ago, and which we now propose to abandon; a policy under which we attracted to our new and fertile lands the farmers and tradesmen of England, France, Germany, Norway, and Sweden; a policy under which we built up our agriculture and at the same time provided the industries which should make a home market for the farmers' products. During the same period we sold our surplus food products in the markets of free-trade England. To-day under that free-trade policy agricultural land within 10 miles of the world's market, London, is selling for $125 per acre.

Under this agreement Canada is providing herself with a free-trade market in the United States for her surplus farm products. At the same time she is protecting the home market made by her manufacturing industries by an amply high tariff against the competition of the United States.

She will attract to her new and fertile lands the farmers and tradesmen of the States and provide for them both a home market in Canada and a free market in the United States under this agreement. For 30 years, from 1860 to 1890, the agriculture of New England stood still. She was feeling the competition of the cheaper lands in the Mississippi Valley. Under this agreement the agriculture of the United States will stand still.

I want briefly now to consider the effect of Canadian competition in farm products upon the price to the farmer.

It is claimed that the incoming tide of foreign farm products will not affect the prices to the farmer by reason of the fact that in foodstuffs and farm products we are an exporting Nation. It requires no figures to demonstrate the fallacy of that conclusion to any man who is familiar with the facts. However, there is abundant evidence, including the report of the Tariff Board recently submitted in response to a resolution of the Senate (S. Doc. No. 849), that the price of land in Canada is much lower than the price of land in agricultural sections of this country; that the price of farm labor is from 17 to 25 per cent lower in Canada than in the United States; and, taking wheat as an example, that the price of wheat in Winnipeg, as compared with Minneapolis, both of which have the same freight rate to Liverpool, is from 11 to 15 cents lower in Winnipeg than in Minneapolis. A proportional difference in the prices of farm products to the producer in Canada and the United States is found practically in all farm products.

It seems to me inevitable that under these conditions, including the difference in the price of land, of labor, and of greater production—the average production of spring wheat in this country being 11.7 bushels and in Canada 15.33 bushels, and winter wheat in this country 15.8 bushels and in Canada 23.49 bushels (report of Tariff Board, p. 94)—these prices must necessarily seek a common level. But assuming that the price of wheat in this country should be decreased only 1 cent a bushel the loss of purchasing power of the American farmer will aggregate nearly $7,000,000 annually, and if the price in Canada should be increased 1 cent a bushel, which is by no means necessarily true, there would be an increase in the purchasing power of the Canadian of a little over a million and a half dollars. This situation will be found all through the entire schedule of agricultural products, and it should illustrate the absurdity of trading the purchasing power of 90,000,000 people for the purchasing power of 9,000,000 people.

Men will tell you that the competition of Canada will not affect the price. I shall not recite any figures of exports to set aside this conclusion, though a careful examination of our exports in farm products leads me to the contrary conclusion, for the experience of every man will tell him that if he has all of a product that will be consumed within the limits of his own market and considerably more, for that matter, which can be exported to other markets, and some competitor should flood his market with a large quantity of the same product, that the inevitable result must be a depression in the price.

No man can tell, or has attempted to tell, how much Canadian produce will break our markets. But the laws which govern this proposition are as immutable as the laws of nature. Gregory King, the noted political economist and mathematician, lays down the following rule: In a commodity a surplus of one-tenth lowers the price below the common rate three-tenths; two-tenths lowers the price below the common rate eight-tenths; three-tenths lowers the price below the common rate sixteen-tenths; four-tenths lowers the price below the common rate twenty-eight tenths; five-tenths lowers the price below the common rate forty-five tenths. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of the application of this principle to our proposed opening of our markets to the products of Canada.

Many men on this floor have deplored the tendency of centralization of population in the large cities, the movement from the farm to the large city; not one of them but would decrease that tendency if it were possible. To my mind there are two ways by which it can be done. One is by increasing the prosperity of the farmer, enabling him to surround himself in so far as it is possible with the conveniences of the city; the other is to make him so poor that he can not move away. The statesmanship that advocates this bill seems to prefer the latter method.

In my own district, one of the oldest and most thickly settled of the agricultural sections of the great agricultural State of Minnesota, the agricultural population in the last 10 years has decreased nearly 15 per cent as a result of the exodus which has taken place in that time to the cheaper and consequently more profitable lands of North and South Dakota and Montana, where profits may be secured with less labor and with less capital. This exodus will not be discontinued. On the contrary, it will be accelerated, but it will be diverted from the lands of the United States to the virgin prairie of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and, to my mind, the greatest asset which Canada will secure by this agreement will be the American farmer. My State is spending thousands of dollars annually to repopulate her abandoned farms—thousands of dollars to make fertile her farms—for she realizes that every farmer that settles upon one of her farms brings an added wealth and added buying capacity of $1,000 annually.

I have been unable to secure definite figures showing to what extent immigration from this country to Canada has taken place in the past, but I think it may be confidently asserted that 400,000 Americans have gone to Canada in the last five years. This immigration can not but be accelerated under the provisions of this agreement which enable the Canadian farmer to raise his product upon the cheap lands of Canada and sell it in competition with the product of the American farmer, in the American market upon an equal basis.

In concluding these remarks let me say that from the consideration which I have laid down I can not come to any other conclusion than that the advantages of this agreement inure wholly to the benefit of Canada; that the progress of the industries of this country will be very greatly retarded; that the prosperity and independence of our farmers will be decreased; that there is an entire and absolute lack of any reciprocal advantage to any of our people or our industries in the agreement.

I would be glad, indeed, if we might obtain a wider market either for the production of our farms or our factories. I think I should be willing even to concede a part of our market if we were offered any share in the Canadian market.

But I can come to no other conclusion than that the prosperity and independence of the American farmer is much too high a price to pay for the concessions which Canada offers in the pending agreement.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN].

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from one of the greatest agricultural States in this country, a State that up to the present time has been almost wholly dependent upon agriculture for its success and its prosperity, it is but natural that I should be highly interested in the speeches that have been made on both sides of this great question. I have been particularly interested in the speeches that have been made by the gentlemen who favor this proposition; and were it not because the consequences will be so serious, I should be highly amused, because from those speeches we are led to believe that the farmers of this country are a lot of ignoramuses, who do not know either what they want, or what is for their own good, or what makes for their own welfare.

Now, my friends, I want to say to you that the farmers of to-day are not what they were 50 years ago. At that time there were comparatively few educated farmers, few men who read the daily press, few men who studied the agricultural journals that are now spread abroad over this country, and then it was easy to fool the farmer; but, my friends, to-day you can go out over the broad prairies of the West, and you will find a different class of people; men who have been educated in the high schools, academies, and universities of the country, and tens of thousands of whom have been educated in the agricultural colleges that are standing to-day as a perpetual monument to the wisdom and patriotism of the Republican Party. You can not fool those men as you did before, and they know that this bill that is now before the House will, if it passes, give them the worst end of the bargain. I live in a locality that is only 20 miles from the Canadian line, and I do not have to go to statistics; I do not have to go to the daily press. I know what the farmer is getting on both sides of the line for farm products. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I know, and any man who has had any experience in the matter knows, that for several years the farmers on this side of the line have been getting an average of from 8 to 12 cents per bushel more for wheat and in the neighborhood of 30 cents per bushel more for barley and about 25 cents per bushel more for flax than the farmers on the Canadian side. In all the speeches that have been made on the floor of this House no man has attempted to deny this fact, and what has troubled them has been to find a plausible reason for the existence of such a difference in the price of the products of the farm in primary markets that are only from 1 to 10 miles apart, outside of the duty that is levied on foreign farm products. This does not trouble the people in our State, for they all know that it is caused by the duty, and the duty alone.

In order to show you the relative value of the three principal crops that are raised in both countries—wheat, barley, and flax—I have here a table showing the prices paid on the various dates mentioned in the table. I will have this table inserted in the RECORD, but I will call your attention now to the fact that for the week ending December 31, 1910, wheat was sold on this side of the line for from 10 to 11 cents more than it was on the other side in towns that were only from 2 to 10 miles apart. On January 10, 1911, the difference in the price was 15 cents in favor of the North Dakota farmer. On January 9, 10, and 11, 1911, the difference in the price of barley in favor of our farmers was from 24 to 29 cents. On the same dates, January 9, 10, and 11, 1911, the difference in the price of flax averaged fully as much as the amount of the duty—25 cents per bushel. As a concrete example, take Portal and North Portal, which are really one town, in which the boundary line between North Dakota and Saskatchewan forms one of the principal streets. Here you will find that there was the same difference in the price of wheat, barley, or flax on the two sides of the street that there was in all the other towns mentioned in the table. Is there any man on either side of this House who is foolish enough to believe that the American miller would pay from 10 to 15 cents per bushel more for wheat, about 30 cents per bushel more for barley, and about 25 cents per bushel more for flax on the south side of a certain street in Portal than they could buy it for on the other side of the same street if the duty was removed? This idea is so absurd that it needs no argument before an audience as intelligent as this.

The burden of all the eloquent speeches that have been made in favor of this measure has been to prove that if this bill becomes a law it will cheapen the products of the farm to the consumer, but will not reduce the price to the farmer. I am astonished that men as intelligent as those who are occupying seats on the floor of this House should make such an absurd statement or think for one moment that this will be believed by even the most ignorant farmers in the country. "It will not hurt the farmer" is a statement that has been made repeatedly the last few days by those who favor this measure. If this is true, how do you account for the fact that every farmers' organization from Maine to California whose members produce the products that are put upon the free list by this so-called pact are bitterly opposed to the measure and are earnestly pleading for its defeat? You say there is no reason why there should be a duty on farm products between countries whose people are operating on an equal basis in every respect. I deny that they are operating on an equal basis. A great deal has already been said about the cheaper Canadian lands and the smaller investment per acre that this necessitates over there and about the virgin soil and the greater yield that it produces, and I will not now burden you with a repetition of these arguments, but there is another matter to which your attention has not yet been called that I wish to refer to for a moment. Canada has three kinds of tariff rates—general tariff, intermediate tariff, and British preferential tariff. As the greater part of the manufactured good imported into Canada comes from Great Britain, and as the goods imported from other countries must be as low in price as those coming from Great Britain, else they would not be purchased, it is only fair to take the rates of duty on British goods as the standard of comparison with our tariff rates. I will therefore insert in the RECORD a table showing the duties paid by the Canadian farmers on the things that he uses in his everyday life and the duties paid by the American farmer on the same articles:

	Canadian tariff.	United States tariff.

Bicycles	20 per cent	45 per cent.

This table shows that on articles generally used the Canadian farmer pays an average duty of from 20 to 35 per cent less than is paid by our farmer. If this measure becomes a law, it will place our farmers in a position where they will have to sell their products in the open markets of the world, Canada being our only real competitor, and purchase what they need from the highly protected industries of the East. I know you Democrats will say that you are going to remedy this by "revising the tariff downward," but you will find yourselves in a position where you will be unable to furnish much relief along this line. True, there are some important schedules that are entirely too high, and these can be revised and adjusted down to a fair and proper basis, and I promise you that I shall vote with you on every proposition of this kind; but you must not forget that under our present constitutional provisions you will be compelled to raise by duties on imports a vast amount of money for the necessary expenses of this Government, and that during 11 months of 1910, 48.7 per cent of our imports came in under the free list and only 51.3 per cent was dutiable. After "revising the tariff downward" to the best of your ability, you will find that, in order to raise the amount of money that must of necessity be raised by a duty on imports, our manufactured products will still be highly protected. And I venture the prophecy that you will not be able to bring our duties down to anywhere near the Canadian preferential duties with which our Canadian neighbors are now favored. The Democratic slogan of "a tariff for revenue only" is a meaningless and misleading phrase, as every intelligent student ought to know. Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, when he was Democratic floor leader in this House, in speaking of this phrase, said, in substance, that, applied to those things which we can produce in our own country, there is no such thing as "a tariff for revenue only," as every duty on such articles is protective to the extent of the duty, whether it be 1 per cent or 100 per cent, and Senator WILLIAMS was absolutely right. I am therefore satisfied that you will not be able by tariff revision to give the American farmer compensation for one-tenth of the amount that you propose to take away from him by placing his products on the free list.

If, then, the Constitution compels you to give protection to our manufacturers, why do you insist on discriminating against our farmers by placing their products on the free list? Is it because you think they are making their money too fast or too easily? If so, I would advise you to read the bulletin just published by the Agricultural Department, in which they say that after thorough investigation they are satisfied it is no longer an easy task to make our American farms pay. Or is it because you think that our farmers are getting more than their just share of the amounts paid by the ultimate consumer? If so, let me read to you the opinion expressed by Secretary of Agriculture, the Hon. James Wilson, before the administration lash induced him to support this measure. In the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1910, pages 19–26, you will find that after a careful investigation of the increase of prices of farm products in their transfer to the consumer Secretary Wilson shows that the difference between the price paid the farmer and the cost to the consumer is in many cases from 40 to 50 per cent. For instance, it was found that poultry growers received only 55.1 per cent of the price paid by the consumer; that the dairyman receives but a scant 50 per cent of the price paid for milk; the apple grower, 55.6 per cent; that beef cost the consumer 38 per cent more than the price paid the great slaughtering houses; and other farm produce from 41 to 50 per cent over the original cost. The conclusion of this section of Secretary Wilson's report is:

> From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer, the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays.
> After consideration of the elements of the matter, it is plain that the farmer is not getting an exorbitant price for his products, and that the cost of distribution from the time of delivery at destination by the railroad to delivery to the consumer is the feature of the problem of high prices which must present itself to the consumer for treatment.

No; it is not the tariff on farm products that is responsible for the high cost of food, but the excessive freight charges of the railways and the exorbitant profits of the commission houses and wholesale dealers through whose hands farm products must pass to reach the consumer.

To show you that Secretary Wilson was right when he expressed what I have just quoted, I will insert another table in the RECORD showing the advance in prices on some of the farmer's necessities, and these are only examples showing the general advance in everything the farmers have to buy.

The following statement was prepared by the Department of Labor in Washington. The average wholesale price in New York and in other primary markets of each article for the years 1890 to 1899, inclusive, is taken as the base price, and is represented by 100. The relative price is the average wholesale price for each year from 1898 to 1909, inclusive, compared with the base price. The relative price in March, 1910, is added:

Clothing, 96 to 126; cotton prints, 72 to 145; boots and shoes, 96 to 128; cotton sheetings, 86 to 134; cotton shirtings, 83 to 126; cotton tickings, 84 to 132; wool blankets, 107 to 131; wool flannels, 97 to 124; wool dress goods, 88 to 140; cotton flannels, 81 to 128; cotton hosiery, 83 to 93; miscellaneous, 92 to 132; fuel and lighting, 95 to 130; metals and implements, 86 to 128; lumber and building material, 95 to 151; house furnishing goods, 92 to 109; crude petroleum, 100 to 153; refined petroleum, 99 to 127; wool carpets, 100 to 117; wool horse blankets, 99 to 135; cotton thread, 98 to 126; cotton yarns, 90 to 131; cotton ginghams, 83 to 124; cotton 2-bushel bags, 95 to 143.

If, after you have considered all this, you still insist upon handicapping our agricultural industry, the one industry upon which the success and prosperity of the whole country depends, it must be because reason and logic, justice and fairness do not appeal to you, or because the political game you are now playing for high stakes is tempting you beyond your power to resist.

The gentlemen on the other side of this House have tried to justify a revolution in our economic and industrial world by claiming that this measure, if enacted into law, will help the poor by reducing the cost of living. Now, let us see what there is in this. While the farmer loses millions of dollars every year on barley, no one has attempted to claim that the brewers will sell a glass of beer for less than the regulation price of 5 cents per glass. The farmer is to be subjected to a loss of millions of dollars per year on flax, and no one has tried to show how this will in any way benefit the poor. The whole argument here has been made on wheat, while, as a matter of fact, wheat is by no means an overshadowing factor in the opposition to this agreement. But suppose that American wheat should drop to the Canadian level, or about 10 cents per bushel, and the ultimate consumer would get the whole benefit, what would it amount to? Our statistics show that, as a people, we consume from 5 to 6 bushels per capita. Now, if the consumer could buy this at a reduction of 10 cents per bushel he would save from 50 to 60 cents per year, or about 1 cent per week. For this infinitesimal amount per capita—which the consumer would not get, because this agreement amply protects the millers so they will not need to pass it on to the consumer—the farmer is to be subjected to competition with the world, although he always has and probably always will have to pay tribute to the consumers of his products whenever he has to buy anything that is produced by them. As long as the American people pay each year four times as much for liquor as they do for bread, and four times as much for tobacco as they do for potatoes, there is little need of revolutionizing our political and industrial systems and unsettling farm values and farm profits in order to save 1 cent per week on our bread.

If this measure must become a law, I would like to so amend this agreement that all importations from Canada would be admitted free of duty. But the gentlemen on the other side of the House declare they will not permit the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" for fear Canada might not accept it if we did. Who, let me ask, is legislating for the United States? Is it this House and the Senate at the other end of the Capitol or is it the Canadian Parliament? If Canada will not accept as a free gift the greatest market in the world, she does not have to take it, for we can get along without her better than she can without us. But that is not the reason for refusing to permit amendments.

The real reason is that your Democratic political machine, working in harmony with the interests affected by the admission of manufactured products free of duty—and both have selfish reasons for supporting this measure—are too powerful for the farmers and their friends to overcome.

I know you are trying to cover your tracks by saying you are going to provide for this free list in a separate bill, but the gentleman from New York "let the cat out of the bag" when he said you felt sure your free list would not become a law. If you were sincere you would attach your free list to this agreement as it would then stand ten times the chance of becoming a law that it does as a separate bill.

With the gentlemen on the other side of this House I have no fault to find as they are true to their traditions and consistent in their position, for they have never been friendly to the farmers, but have always looked to the congested cities for their political strength. A striking example of this is New York, where the Democrats nearly always carry the city of New York by about 100,000 majority, and the farmers of the State just as often roll up a Republican majority large enough to more than offset the city vote. The distinguished gentleman from New York, the Hon. FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON, in a speech on this same subject delivered on the 13th of February last, indicated so plainly where the sympathies of the Democratic Party lie that I shall quote him. He said:

The recent election, bringing about the first overthrow the Republicans have sustained in many years, was freighted with one great demand—the demand by the people of our congested cities to take the taxes off from food and clothing. In response to that mandate we are now taking the first step. From the east side of New York City a million voices are raised in appeal to you that you should make this bill a law. From every city of the East they cry out to you for relief.

If this is not evidence enough of the unfriendliness of the Democratic Party for the farmers of the Northwest, we have but to remember the fact that the Democratic majority, represented by its floor leader, has absolutely refused to grant the farmers a hearing before the final vote is taken. In order to be heard in their own cause, the farmers will have to go to the Republican Senate, where they will be recognized.

Gentlemen, it is a plain case of the cities against the farmers, and with the cities are leagued nearly every trust and monopoly in the country, together with the great financiers that control them. It is a great combination, and it now looks as if it will be a winning one, in this end of the Capitol, at least.

To you, my Republican colleagues who are supporting this measure, I want to sound a note of warning. The Republican platform of 1908 declared for duties equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. Are you now by your votes going to so interpret this platform that the farmer who invests his all in the farm upon which he lives and where he and his family work, not 8 hours but 16 hours a day, is not to be included in the provision for guaranteed profits that you give to the manufacturer? If so, the Republican Party will never recover from your actions. Applied to the things we can produce in abundance at home, this country can not exist half protection and half free trade; it must be wholly one or the other, and upon your votes on this measure will depend largely what it is to be in the future. You may entertain the fond hope that the farmers, after you have done your utmost to assassinate their industry, will continue to vote for protection for the factories, shops, and mills you represent; but if so, let me disabuse your minds of any such foolish notions. For 50 years it has been the farmer vote that has maintained the principle of protection to American industries, and he has always been promised that he would get the direct benefits that the manufacturers have always had when the consumption of his products would equal the supply. Now, after all these years of loyal support, are you going to break faith with him? If so, can you give me a single reason why the farmers should continue to vote for protection on anything they have to buy?

President Taft has persistently urged the creation of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission, taking the position that no intelligent action can be taken on any subject involving the tariff without a thorough scientific investigation of the subject by a competent commission. In response to his demand, Congress gave him a Tariff Board composed of five men, who are perhaps as competent and impartial as any men in this country. When President Taft went to work on this Canadian tariff agreement, did he first have the Tariff Board investigate the subject for him and advise him as to the probable effect it would have on the farmers of this country? No! He first initiated a tariff agreement that will not only have a tremendous effect on our agricultural industries, but will entirely revolutionize our tariff laws and in all probability entirely wipe out protection as a principle. He then put the Tariff Board to work on the matter, and when they reported and he discovered their findings were against his reciprocity theories he ignored their report.

Are you, my Republican colleagues, going to put your stamp of approval upon such a measure as this? In order to do so, do not forget that you will have to absolutely ignore the findings of the Tariff Board, whose complete report on this subject has finally been published and whose findings are absolutely against the passage of this measure. The Democrats have loudly proclaimed that this is a Democratic measure, and, smarting under this claim, the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Massachusetts and others have tried to show that it is not contrary to Republican doctrine. I think you will concede that ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed was one of the greatest exponents of protection that ever lived in this country and that his definition of Republican protection principles would be accepted by every Republican protectionist. I therefore want to quote a few lines from an article he wrote shortly before he died, in 1902. He said:

Protection rests upon principle or it does not. If it does not, then it is a mere bestowal of bounty and is no part of the business of government. If it rests upon principle, then that principle must be that the American markets belong to the Americans. You can not maintain your system and sacrifice anything to which it is applicable. * * * If we propose to abandon any industries, we had better not let it be the agricultural industries. Between the Atlantic and Pacific stretch vast regions still untilled. The next victory of protection should be there.

Our system of protection is not for the manufacturers alone. It is for farmers also. Whoever deprives our farmers of all the American market they can occupy is false to their principles and must meet with defeat, or the system must be surrendered which proclaims that American markets are, first of all, for American citizens who are engaged in developing the country we already have.

Blaine was the author of reciprocity, and he crystallized it in a letter he wrote to President Harrison in 1891, in which he said:

It is of the highest possible importance that there be no treaty of reciprocity with Canada. They aim at natural products, to get all the products of the farm on us in exchange for heaven knows what. I would cut the whole thing up by the roots. It would be considered a betrayal of the agricultural interests. The fact is, we do not want any intercourse with Canada except through the medium of a tariff. We are tending to have the great majority of the farmers with us. Let us encourage them by every means we can use and not discourage them by anything. We will break that alliance before six months if we maintain this policy.

The present proposed "betrayal of the farmers" was foreseen by Blaine. He pleaded 20 years ago that we should encourage, not discourage, the farmers.

McKinley learned his lessons in reciprocity from Blaine. He also believed in protecting the farmers. There is not a line to be found in his writings that shows to the contrary. His ideas of reciprocity were placed in the Republican national platform of 1900, on which he made a campaign. In that platform reciprocity reads as follows:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

In his last inaugural McKinley referred to this matter, using the language of the platform on which he was elected. This is what he said:

The end in view must always be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend to increase their employment.

In his Buffalo speech McKinley said:

By sensible trade agreements which will not interrupt home production we shall extend the outlet of our increasing surplus.

And again, in this same speech:

We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

The language and the meaning of the three great advocates of reciprocity in the past is clear and plain. What now passes for reciprocity is not reciprocity. It is not fair exchange. It is simply a sacrificing of our agricultural interests to gain benefits for other interests.

If this is a correct interpretation of the Republican doctrine of protection—and who will dare to say it is not—how can any man claim to be a Republican who works and votes for this measure which violates the principles of protection thus interpreted both in letter and in spirit? I am not pleading for any specific amount of protection on farm products, but I do claim that the great agricultural industry affected by this measure, the greatest and most important industry we have, is entitled to the same consideration and the same benefits under protection that are extended to our manufactured products. No one has denied that the farmers operate our most important industry, and they produce almost wholly raw material, in which the profit is comparatively small.

I agree with John R. Mauff, of the Wisconsin Equity News, who, in speaking of the farmers, says they are the producers of a very large percentage of all the so-called raw material. From these raw materials are developed all of the foodstuffs, including bread, the dairy products, the poultry products, sugars, vegetables, and fruits, all of the grains used in the manufacture of malt and distilled liquors. From these raw materials are also developed the fabrics which the common people use as raiment and for the various household needs, such as cotton, woolen, and linen goods.

These are the people who have cleared the forests, built the highways, erected the schoolhouses, and built the farm residences and splendid barns that dot the landscape. They changed the face of nature and converted the wilderness into a world of peace and plenty, teeming with all the elements of life that enable that other percentage of the Nation's population to live in luxury unknown to the masses in any other country. It is this percentage of farmers that has produced the wealth of the Nation in the main and who feed and clothe the other percentage, including those who consume without producing, as well as other millions who labor in the factories and workshops and in the fields of transportation and commerce. They have filled to overflowing from field and farm and garden, from all over the land, the horn of plenty that pours out so copiously the richest and sweetest of beef and pork and mutton and bread and butter and fruits into the larder of the housewife in every kitchen in every hamlet and village and city throughout the length and breadth of the land.

I speak of these things to show that a class engaged in an industry of such magnitude and the product of whose toil is so absolutely necessary to producer and nonproducer alike should at least be fairly dealt with in matters of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I will accuse no man of deliberately trying to ruin the farmers of this country, but I think that you fail to understand the importance of the uninterrupted prosperity of our agricultural industry and to realize that anything that tends to reduce the legitimate profits of our farmers will affect in a still greater degree the success and prosperity of the toilers in our factories, shops, and mills, and, in fact, the welfare and prosperity of every industry in this country.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with deep interest and marked attention to remarks of the various gentlemen upon this very important question and have yet to observe where it would be of benefit to the great people of the United States to adopt it. No one has undertaken to say how it will be of benefit to the American farmer, and that task, I apprehend, will not be demonstrated upon the floor of this Chamber.

NO BENEFIT TO THE FARMER.

It is not satisfactory to them to say they will not be injured. The question is, How will they be benefited? Do you think that by admitting the farm products free into their market you will benefit them? As well might it be claimed that you benefit the great sheep industry of this country by admitting Australian wool free of duty. How will it benefit the American farmer by admitting hundreds of thousands of tons of hay into his market, by admitting millions of bushels of wheat, barley, beans, and farm products; or the great American laborer by admitting the cheap pauper labor of England, Germany, France, Italy, Japan, and Mexico into this country unrestricted?

FARMERS PROTEST.

I hold in my hand more than 40 telegrams, received yesterday and to-day, all protesting against the enactment of this proposed treaty into law. I admit that there are a few of them sent by merchants, manufacturers, and tradesmen, but the majority are sent by farmers and granges; and I want to admit another thing, lest I forget it, and it might escape your attention, and that is that they are all hot ones. You say that the farmers do not know what they want. You claim the right to give them what they want and not even consult them. Do you claim the right to take away any man's property or his market without giving him anything in return? Do you think the great, intelligent American farmer would trade his birthright for a mess of Canadian porridge? He has endured the hardship of frontier life; he has not only done his part, but he has done more than any other class to clear up and improve and beautify this magnificent Republic; he has paid his taxes willingly to build our churches and schools; he has built the crossroads and the people's highways.

CAN NOT FOOL THE FARMERS.

There are four college centers in my district, Kalamazoo, Albion, Hillsdale, and Olivet. The farmers of my district pay liberally and are taxed handsomely to support the great University of Michigan, represented on the floor of this House by a larger number than any other institution of learning in our land. Within 4 miles from my district and in the very heart of the State is the first and greatest agricultural college in the United States. We have the free rural delivery of our mails, and I will not insult the intelligence of the great American farmer by saying that he does not know what he wants.

One-third of the population of this country are engaged in agriculture. Their eyes are to-day upon this body. We may have our way to-day, we may have our way here, but they will have their way to-morrow if you strike this blow at their material welfare. Their profits are below that of any other branch of industry. Fifteen bushels of wheat to the acre; 80 cents a bushel is the price; $12 the reward; $2 profit for your investment, your days' work from sun to sun, and you are lucky to get that.

PURPOSE OF THE PROPOSED TREATY.

It was inspired by a desire to reduce the cost of living, to build up a more friendly relation between the two countries and to extend the market for our manufactured products.

The farmer is now getting low prices for his farm products, barely enough to pay for his toil and leaving very little for his investment. I am not impressed with the low cost of living idea or the low cost propaganda. Labor is more cheerful and better contented when it is well paid; the manufacturer is more prosperous when his prices are fair and he gets a just return for his endeavor. The farmer is no exception and is entitled to a just compensation for his work. It is admitted on all hands that times are better when prices are high and the purpose of the agreement to reduce the cost of living can not be based upon the cost received by the farmer for his products. If so, please put it in on the record. Even the threat of enacting this agreement has cost the farmers already more than a million of dollars. I will place on record the prices of farm products obtained from one of the most reliable sources in this country by a person who has spent 50 years a grain and wool merchant of Charlotte, Mich., and in close touch with the farmers, who writes me under date of April 7, 1911:

	Apr. 7, 1911.	Apr. 7, 1910.
Choice red wheat (60 pounds)	$0.80	$1.10
Oats	.28	.45
Shelled corn	.50	.65
Lambs, live weight (per hundredweight)	5.00- 5.50	8.00- 8.50
Hogs (per hundredweight)	.06	8.00- 8.50
Cattle (per hundredweight)	.04- .05	5.50- 7.00
Potatoes	.30	.60
Eggs	.12	.17
Wool	.17- .18	.23- .25
Butter	.16- .18	.20- .25
Beans (per bushel)	1.60	2.25

And a like reduction for other and similar products.

MORE FRIENDLY RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

If it is claimed that it is necessary to pass this reciprocity agreement in order to establish better relations with Canada, upon what ground are you going to refuse a similar treaty with Great Britain, Germany, France, Spain, Japan, Mexico, and the other great sister nations? You propose to tear down the fortress of protection to the farming industry of this country because there is upon the rampart no guns pointed toward our Canadian neighbors. I am for peace, but I am not for peace at any cost, and when you destroy the market of the agriculturists of this country it is at a great sacrifice, which reflects itself not only as to his market but as to his home, his rights, and his independence by allowing this foreign competition.

AM FOR TAFT.

I do not understand that in framing this proposed Canadian reciprocity agreement that the farmer was anywhere consulted. Who had anything to do with the creation and instigation of this proposed treaty who is directly engaged in or concerned with that particular branch of industry? I am in favor of extending to that great class, which is so directly concerned, the right to be heard upon this great question. I am for the President, and I trust he may be elected in spite of himself, and the farmers of this country will have no better place to cast their lot than with the Republican Party. He is a protectionist and not a free trader, and we should nominate and elect him in spite of himself. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I sat here the other day and listened with great interest to my friend [Mr. KITCHIN] from North Carolina. Mr. KITCHIN is always interesting, even when his logic is wholly bad. He declared that reciprocity is a Democratic doctrine and that the Democratic Party stands for a still wider application of that doctrine than that contemplated in the pending bill. This question I shall not discuss.

I wonder at the logic of my friend, however, when he argues for reciprocity and its advantages, and then argues that the price of American products will not be disturbed by the reciprocal agreement and that the price that the American farmer in Minnesota and the Dakotas will receive for his No. 1 wheat will not be less by reason of the dumping into this country of Canadian wheat of the same quality. If this is true, then we are pretending to be giving to Canada something that, as a matter of fact, we are not giving her. We are pretending to give her people a market which, after all, is no better than the Canadian home market, according to his contention. If this is so, why not end the consideration of this question here and now? Why carry it further, for all that it amounts to after all is that we are handing to Canada that which I gather from his own words amounts to a gold brick and in return therefor receive what I believe is a gold brick?

But I do not agree with my friend. I believe we are actually making concessions to Canada, and are not receiving sufficient concessions in return. I wish I could favor this pending bill. I like the word "reciprocity," and believe that a reciprocal treaty could be drawn between the United States and Canada that would be of benefit to both lands. That is the only kind of reciprocity bill that is worth while; that is the only kind of bill that should be considered.

The pending reciprocity agreement has the support of different Members of this body for various reasons. Republicans support it who, believing in the policy of protection, believe as well in reciprocity, and that the pending measure will perfect our system of protection. Republicans support it who believe the tariff law contains many imperfections, and that the pending measure, imperfect though it may be, is a wedge that will mark the beginning of tariff modification. It has the support of Democrats who announce that they believe in free trade, and of Democrats who believe in wholesale tariff modification and that the present reciprocal proposition will open the way to such modification, and they even stand for a still wider application of the doctrine than is contemplated in the pending bill. All unite in the desire to scale down the cost of living.

As for myself, I frankly confess that I believe that the present tariff law contains provisions that should be modified at the earliest possible time, but I am afraid that the pending reciprocity bill will be a disappointment to all those who believe in the policy of protection and yet believe in tariff modification. I recognize merit in the proposed reciprocal agreement, and yet, since an agreement of this character is in the nature of a bargain or trade, we must look to our part of the bargain and consider how it will affect every person in our country. Looking at the proposed agreement from the standpoint of the beginning of tariff modification, I fear we are not touching the important schedules that need attention, but are laying the lash upon the poor fellow's back who said that imperfections exist in the tariff law. And, again, our proposed modification, as I see it, is so unbalanced as to fail to scale down the cost of living, as I think I can demonstrate.

The pending bill provides for placing upon the free list of each country for the benefit of the other many articles and commodities that are produced in both countries. I shall insert in my speech at this point a list that I have taken from the bill that is now pending:

Live animals: Cattle, horses and mules, swine, sheep, lambs, and all other live animals.
Poultry, dead or alive.
Wheat, rye, oats, barley, and buckwheat, dried peas and beans, edible.
Corn, sweet corn, or maize.
Hay, straw, and cowpeas.
Fresh vegetables: Potatoes, sweet potatoes, yams, turnips, onions, cabbages, and all other vegetables in their natural state.
Fresh fruits: Apples, pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state, except lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, shaddocks, pomelos, and pineapples.
Dried fruits: Apples, peaches, pears, and apricots, dried, desiccated, or evaporated.
Dairy products: Better, cheese, and fresh milk and cream: Provided, That cans actually used in the transportation of milk or cream may be passed back and forth between the two countries free of duty, under such regulations as the respective Governments may prescribe.
Eggs of barnyard fowl, in the shell.
Honey.

The bill fails to place on the free list certain other commodities, mention of which I shall make in my printed speech, and which list is closely related to the free list, and yet for some reason is granted the benefit of protection:

Fresh meats: Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game, 1¼ cents per pound.
Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars, 1¼ cents per pound.
Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner, not otherwise herein provided for, 1¼ cents per pound.
Canned meats and canned poultry, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Extract of meat, fluid or not, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearin, and animal stearin, 1¼ cents per pound.
Tallow, 40 cents per 100 pounds.
Egg yolk, egg albumen, and blood albumen, 7½ per cent ad valorem.
Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn, in cans or other air-tight packages, and including the weight of the package, 1¼ cents per pound.
Wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour, 50 cents per barrel of 196 pounds.
Oatmeal and rolled oats, including the weight of paper covering, 50 cents per 100 pounds.
Corn meal, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.
Barley malt, 45 cents per 100 pounds. Barley, pot, pearled, or patent, one-half cent per pound.
Buckwheat flour or meal, one-half cent per pound.
Prepared cereal foods, not otherwise provided for herein, 17½ per cent ad valorem.
Bran, middlings, and other offals of grain used for animal food, 12½ cents per 100 pounds.
Pickles, including pickled nuts, sauces of all kinds, and fish paste or sauce, 32½ per cent ad valorem.
Farm wagons and finished parts thereof, 22½ per cent ad valorem.
Plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators; thrashing machines, including windstackers, baggers, weighers, and self-feeders therefor and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing, 15 per cent ad valorem.
Portable engines with boilers, in combination, horsepowers and traction engines for farm purposes; hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, manure spreaders, weeders, and windmills, and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing, except shafting, 20 per cent ad valorem.

I have not pretended to give a complete list, but from an examination of the most important items which I have given this fact stands out: That the raw material is not protected, while the manufactured product has practically the same protection that it has when imported from any other country.

Now, let us look this matter over just as we would look over any other business proposition. If it is a good thing, let us avail ourselves of it. If it is bad, let us reject it. There is nothing whatever in the name "reciprocity." It may include everything that is good, or it may include everything that is bad. It may be wholly a giving without a compensation. What of the pending agreement, and how will it affect our country?

Our country has a population of approximately 90,000,000 people. Canada has a population of approximately 8,000,000 people. Our imports from Canada to-day of dutiable goods amount to $47,827,959, and Canada's imports from the United States of dutiable goods amount to $47,333,158. From this Canada's revenue is $7,776,236 annually and our revenue $5,649,826.

The pending bill has to do with commodities that are in very large part produced in both countries, and yet through the demand from year to year and notwithstanding the present duties our country is furnishing a market for many of these products. Last year nearly 1,000,000 bushels of oats were shipped into the United States from Canada and found sale in our markets after paying a duty of 15 cents per bushel. Nearly 100,000 tons of Canadian hay were shipped and sold in our markets after meeting a duty of $4 per ton. Last year nearly 1,000,000 pounds of butter were imported and upon the same a duty of 6 cents per pound was collected, and upon all the commodities that were shipped over the line we collected last year in duties, that we are now asked to surrender, $4,849,933. With the removal of the duties the same commodities would be able to bear down the prices of like commodities in the United States to at least the amount of the duty, and the farmer would lose accordingly. As against this we can not hope for compensating markets in Canada. Nine-tenths of the population of both countries is on the side of the United States, and it takes people to make a market.

But what I have suggested with respect to our imports from Canada upon the theory that if we import the same amount annually in the future our markets would be depressed to that extent is only the small part of this problem. At this time Canada is shipping to us a comparatively small amount of her products of which I am speaking, while she is shipping to England many times this amount, and here lies the difficulty. Between England and Canada there is no tariff, and does anyone doubt that with 3,000 miles cut off from the distance of transportation that Canada would immediately consign the goods that she has to sell to American markets instead of sending them to markets on the other side of the Atlantic? If anyone doubts this he certainly has a wrong conception of business principles.

On this head we need not feel so much disturbed for the present year or for next year. Nor need we feel disturbed on account of the $5,000,000 in revenues that we are surrendering. The imports within the next year or two would necessarily mean something of a loss to our farmers, but it would be scattered over a large population, and thereby would not be so keenly felt. More than this consideration, a consideration appeals to me that has to do with a condition that, as I see it, is just a few years ahead, should this treaty become effective, and the effect that the condition that will exist then will have in preventing the rightful increase in land values within our own country. Our farmers have with care and patience built up their lands, and it is not right that they should now be denied the legitimate value that belongs to such lands by reason of the opening up in competition lands that are now of little value upon the Canadian side of the line.

Within the United States the public lands have been very largely acquired by private individuals through the generous public-land laws of our country. Lands that have a value for agricultural purposes have passed to private ownership. Our great grazing plains are gone. Extensive farming upon the part of the individual must more and more give place to intensive farming in order that values may be produced upon the investment. No one can deny that the extensive areas of unappropriated public lands that the Government has offered free under the homestead laws have played an important part during the last half century in discouraging intensive farming and as well in keeping down the price of lands in the older sections of the United States. Intensive farming means more of cost to the farmer, just as stall-fed stock mean a greater expense to the stockgrower than the range-fed cattle of 20 years ago.

I am opposed to this bill, because I believe it will spell disaster to the American farmer, for the reason that large areas will be opened to settlement in Canada within the immediate future, and the cost of production in Canada for the next 20 or 30 years will be found to be cheaper than the cost of production within our own country. Canadian land is new, it is virgin, it will produce such an acreage with the minimum amount of labor as will enable the farmers there to flood our markets with their hay, their oats and other grains, their butter and eggs and other farm produce, and the price that will be received will be remunerative to the Canadian, but meager to the farmer of our own land. This is a proposition that is easy of demonstration. Canadian land that is avilable for farm purposes is worth on an average less than one-half what it is worth on this side of the line. A farmer who has $6,000 to invest in land and can buy 100 acres of $60 land in the United States can buy 200 acres of the same quality of land across the Canadian border. A schoolboy can figure out that the producer on the cheap land can sell his products at a remunerative price, and that the same price would net a small margin of gain to the farmer raising the crop on a more expensive land.

But this is not all. The supplies which the Canadian buys he buys at a less cost. In the United States there is a uniform tariff upon the products imported from foreign countries, while in Canada, in addition to the tariffs between Canada and foreign countries, there is a British preferential tariff. This preferential tariff being less than the tariff between Canada and other countries, must necessarily set the price. The tariff on the goods that the American farmer must buy is from 25 per cent to nearly 50 per cent more than this preferential tariff that is available to the Canadian, and the farmer of the United States is compelled to pay that much more for the commodities which he would buy.

On rubber boots and shoes and on rubber coats the Canadian pays 15 per cent duty, the consumer in our country 35 per cent; on jute bags, in which the farmer in my State sells his grain, he pays a duty of 45 per cent, while his Canadian competitor across the line pays 15 per cent; on a sewing machine for his wife our farmer pays a duty of 30 per cent, the Canadian 20 per cent; on a stove for the kitchen our farmer pays 45 per cent, the Canadian 15 per cent; on shovels and axes it is the same; on dress goods our farmer pays 60 per cent, the Canadian 15 per cent; on wire our farmer pays 75 cents per 100 pounds, while the Canadian buys his wire at not to exceed 10 per cent, and much of it is free of duty. Our farmer pays 55 per cent duty on his hat, the Canadian only 20 per cent; our farmer 45 per cent duty on his underwear, the Canadian 22½ per cent, or just one-half that amount; and so I could continue if I had time, and I could show that the farmer on this side of the line is placed at a distinct disadvantage when compared with his Canadian brother because of the preferential duty between Canada and the great manufacturing country of Great Britain. Yet if this treaty shall go into effect, you will expect the American farmer, the farmer of your State and mine, to compete in our own markets in the sale of his hay and his oats, his eggs and his butter, his fruits and his vegetables.

And when it comes to labor it is almost the same. It is true that the wages paid in the part of Canada immediately north of my own State and the State of Washington is about the same as the wages paid to the Canadian laborers across the line, but, taking all the other parts of Canada and comparing them with the United States, the wages paid are nearly 25 per cent higher, on an average, in the United States than the wages paid for similar labor in the parts of Canada of which I speak. Certainly, wages on the farms of the United States must come down to meet the Canadian wage scale or else the American farmer must incur a loss.

I am opposed to this treaty for, as I see it, it is reciprocal in name alone. No one can deny that in revenues we are surrendering approximately twice as much as is Canada. On this point I shall not speak, because I think it is a small consideration. The treaty is reciprocal in name only, because its benefits are not reciprocal. On the one side the Canadian is benefited by being offered a market at home for his products. He is benefited because this will build up his lands, stimulate railroad development, and give him other business enterprises from Halifax to Vancouver. But what is given to the citizens of the United States in return for all this? It is useless to say that the markets of Canada are thrown open to his products. The Canadian markets are already overstocked; there are no extensive markets there for American goods. What other compensation is offered? Why, that the cost of living will be lowered. Now, on this head let us make a little inquiry. It is proposed to place wheat, oats, and other grains upon the free list. But it is also proposed to leave a duty upon flour, prepared cereal foods, and other products of grain. The housekeeper does not buy wheat for her family; she buys flour or bread. She does not buy oats or corn; she buys prepared cereals. If a duty is retained upon the flour and the cereal foods, even though grains are admitted free, do you suppose the consumer will buy his flour or his bread or his cereal food cheaper? Not a bit of it. The consumer will pay just as much, but some one else besides the farmer will receive the benefit. The middle man, the broker, the manufacturer will receive the difference. Let us inquire further. It is proposed to place cattle, hogs, and sheep upon the free list; but the duty is still maintained with slight modification on fresh and cured meats and on the other products of live stock. Can anyone seriously argue that the consumer would pay less for his ham, or his bacon, or his beefsteak, or chops, because the live stock is admitted free? I think not. What would compel the great packing plant to sell its products cheaper? It has no additional competition. On the other hand, it will be able to make a larger profit because, while buying the cattle, hogs, and sheep in a cheaper market, it will sell its manufactured products in the same old market and at the same old price.

Again, I say the housekeeper does not buy beeves, she buys meat; she does not buy hogs, she buys ham or bacon; she does not buy sheep, she buys mutton. And so I conclude that that which the friends of the treaty call a benefit will prove elusive. Elusive to the farmer, because while it offers markets to him, there are small markets in Canada that he wants; and elusive to the consumer, because while the duty is removed from the raw material it is retained in almost its original form upon the manufactured product.

The desire upon the part of the administration to do something that will lower the cost of living is most commendable, yet I believe that whatever may have been the idea when the reciprocity question was first considered, that the working out of the agreement will not attain this end. More than this, even if it should attain this end, it is at the expense of the farmer. Of all those in our country who have stood by the policy of protection, the farmer up to the present has received the smallest returns. Within the last few years the wisdom of the policy is justifying itself to the farmer, and at this time, with the farmer coming into his own as never before, we propose to take from him the benefit that in all justice to him rightfully belongs.

The farmer is not selfish in this fight. More than one of them have said to me that they would be willing to make the sacrifice necessary to bring down the cost of living providing a similar sacrifice be made by our other producers and by the manufacturers. More than this, more than one have said to me that they would stand for the Canadian treaty with all the loss that it means to them providing in that treaty may be incorporated reciprocal agreements touching not the raw products alone, but manufactured products as well. If you are going to throw down the bars on his products, let us throw them all down and let business intercourse and freedom be complete between our own country and the great nation to the north of us.

Yes; but some one says the Democratic Congress proposes to pass a bill placing upon the free list some of the articles mentioned on the protection list with Canada. I am asked if that might make some difference with my vote. In answer I would say that it might, providing the items were included in the present bill. This, however, is impossible. More than this, there is no certainty of the passage of the bill that has been proposed. What is less certain than the outcome of a Congress one branch of which is Democratic and the other Republican? Who is here to promise that the bill will be followed by another that will correct injustices in this one? Who can give assurances that it can pass? Here is a bill that, as I see it, works an injustice upon the farmers of my State and upon our country, and I can not sacrifice their interests upon a promise that no one here is able to fulfill. I must consider the pending bill providing for reciprocity with Canada upon its own merits, and, considering it upon its own merits, I am compelled to be opposed to its passage. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, during the debate on this question of reciprocity there has been every opportunity to make observations concerning the sentiment prevailing throughout the country as reflected in the expression of Members residing in all parts of the Republic. In the face of the President's desire, as expressed in his several messages, there were recorded against this bill when last before us 87 Republican votes, and so uncertain were the managers of the treaty as to its probable fate as a party measure, that a caucus was not called to consider its merits. In fact, I have not learned of a single Senator or Member with whom the Chief Executive counseled before presenting this treaty or trade agreement to Congress. It is evident from the wide divergence of opinion and utter lack of unanimity on the part of the Republican representation here that the objections to this measure are founded on logical and rational reasons, this conclusion being reached, if in no other way, by the fact that 87 Members, or a majority of 9 Republicans, cast their votes against it. Coming directly from the people, as did the Members of the House which convened in December, the vote of that body in February on this measure carries with it the weight of extraordinary significance.

We believe the President to be thoroughly honest and sincere and surely hopeful of the result of the enactment of this legislation; but it is not to be expected that even a President of this great Republic is either infallible, immortal, or immaculate, and error with him is within the range of possibility.

From a political standpoint it may after all result in much good to the Republican Party, for it has been demonstrated during the discussion of this measure that when fundamentals of the Republican Party are assaulted insurgent and stalwart can and do stand together. The kind of insurgents we have in this House I can now regard from a different angle and a different measure of respect than I did when I first came here and witnessed the petty and inconsequential rows over minor and collateral matters. Now, in the time of real trial, when the party has been outvoted and is without power to take the initiative or achieve direct results, they stand like oak and rock, side by side with the stalwarts of the faith of our party's immortal leaders; and in the face of the rising, triumphant shouts of Democracy take their ground when loyalty is best demonstrated and true party pride and patriotism are most needed.

I come from the Republican State of Pennsylvania, a State that is true and certain in her Republican majorities, never wavers, is always stalwart, yields to no State in freedom of suffrage, universal primary law, and triumphs under the unbeaten leadership of the Senate's new head. Notwithstanding my own affiliation during more than a quarter of a century and tendencies toward centralized strength within party council, I am ever ready and willing to recognize what is just and right, and from what I have seen in recent days of the attitude of the so-called insurgents I am impelled to make these passing observations.

The Democratic Speaker long ago claimed this reciprocity treaty to be a real Democratic baby, and I have heard his successor lay like claim, while Mr. KITCHIN on last Saturday made a similar modest challenge.

From a political standpoint, what is the Republican Party to get out of this measure by way of political advantage in case it should be enacted into law?

Observing this Republican minority and recalling last fall's election reverses, it is evident that we not only need to hold the farmer vote, but we must first get him back into the fold if we are to win the presidential election in 1912. I submit that if it is agreed we must have him back, will we accomplish that purpose by removing the tariff from the products of his farm and retaining a tax on what he buys?

We already have 60 per cent of Canada's import trade, while 30 per cent is made up of teas, coffees, spices, champagne, diamonds, and other luxuries which we do not produce, leaving a beggarly 10 per cent of business to compete for. For the mere chance, which we already have, to get part of this remaining 10 per cent we propose removing the tariff from 76 per cent of Canada's exports, with only approximately 17 per cent of our export articles to be admitted free into Canada!

This is truly a one-sided pancake, although the working out of such a policy might be of unusual interest to the Beef Trust, the Harvester Trust, and the Milling Trust. Therefore, if there is only ruin ahead for the Republican Party in abandoning the tenets of the past, of turning from the principles which made the country great and rich and strong, what is there if viewed from the position taken by the President in his message? It is declared, on the one hand, that reciprocity is to give the poor man a better breakfast at lower cost than at present, while, on the other hand, the farmer is told—and we were told right here even yesterday—that reciprocity would not reduce the cost of food products to the ultimate consumer.

There seems to be a contradiction here that thoroughly explodes any theory that will definitely fix the outcome of this trade agreement, excepting that it is certain to give away the world's greatest market with nothing in return, and yet the bill is labeled reciprocity, which is a misnomer and a misconception.

As illustrating the fallacy of this whole breakfast theory and that the farmer is not the man to be pursued because of high prices for food, I bring before you an object lesson which must carry conviction. I hold in my hand a small catalogue issued from the Pennsylvania State College, which contains the names of the students and a few advertisements. State College is located in the heart of Pennsylvania, in a rich agricultural district and farms virtually abutting the campus, and not a cold-storage plant is within 50 miles of the place. There is a free, normal market for agricultural products; in fact, prices should be necessarily a little higher than normal, with 1,800 consuming students creating the demand, and yet I find in this little book an advertisement asking to take boarders at $3 per week. Three dollars per week, or 21 meals at less than 15 cents each, and these meals must necessarily be substantial, as they are served for hungry professors, hungry, growing schoolboys, and football players. In this locality the consumer deals directly with the farmer; in Washington and other cities the consumer deals with the cold-storage baron, and pays 45 cents per pound for calf's liver and 10 cents each for apples.

If you break down this tariff which protects the farmer; if you break down the tariff which protects the manufacturer, then we instantly face in field and in factory competition with Europe's cheapest labor and Asia's worse than slavery. But do not break it down. Keep up protection, not so high that it will be a menace to anybody, but, in any event, if the plan works, keept it up so that it may show the difference of cost of production at home and abroad. But, while protective tariff laws are making the country as a whole mighty with wealth, and it can not be so without protection, let us see to it that the rewards are better divided. Let us see that the great combinations of wealth which have sprung into existence are properly regulated. You can quickly break these mighty combinations of capital called trusts by the ruinous remedy of free trade, but by the application of this method you will at the same time break the country. There must be Federal power great and strong enough, and a power exercised, to meet this trust situation, to bring up with a turn this invisible, insidious power which has been getting most of the reward and the toiling masses so little.

Yes; protection to the farmer, protection to the capitalist, protection to the manufacturer, all in fair and equitable measure; but the place protection is now most needed is around the bending back of labor. The sequel to this suggestion is written against the horizon each day as the great ocean liners emerge from the mists off of Sandy Hook, and from the deck of each great racer of the seas there may be seen from 1,000 to 2,000 hopeful faces peering into the promised land.

Immigrants, immigrants, millions of them, coming to our shores to do what—develop America? No; not the kind who are coming now, for, according to the President's message, the country is overdeveloped already. What then? To help the steamship companies? Yes; that is it; the steamship companies, to make them rich that they may build more ships abroad, fly them under a foreign flag and receive a foreign subsidy, while the millions they bring turn countless thousands of Americans into the streets. Had our great and good President suggested the enactment of some measure that would divert this stream of foreign immigration now coming to this country into Canada, instead of proposing that a stream of Canadian products shall swamp our markets and thereby drive hundreds of thousands of American farmers and their families from under the protecting folds of the American flag to find new homes under the banner of the British Empire, the uplifted hands of not only the agriculturist, but of the American laborer, would have called down from on high a divine blessing.

With the spectacle witnessed on this floor last week of the Democratic majority rejecting real election reform which might have effected the peculiar election system prevailing in the South; with a northern college professor teaching his students to respect the red flag of anarchy instead of the Stars and Stripes; and a Democratic Cabinet member belittling and demeaning the old veterans of the North who hurled back treason and saved the Nation from dissolution, it is indeed high time that Republicans took seriously the issues of the hour and declined to follow misguided leadership.

So far as my constituents are concerned, Pennsylvania, where independence was born, the State which furnished first defenders for all the wars and money without limit, and on whose sacred soil, by the valor of her sons, was determined the fate of independence in Revolutionary days as well as the fate of the Nation from 1861 to 1865, shall not be misunderstood.

My constituents believe in the old nationalism, the old patriotism, the old progressive republicanism. They people the valleys where Lee's mighty army marched forth to expected triumph and retreated in defeat, where McCausland's marauders applied the torch and exacted tribute, but did not conquer the national spirit of that brave, true people whose humble spokesman I am proud to be to-day.

The Republican Party, if it will stand bravely united against this un-Republican and un-American policy, which is but the forerunner of free trade, and are determined to fuse for that final and ultimate battle for the firesides of the farmer and the workingman, the party will again be triumphant, its messages will be heard to-day and in the long future, and posterity will ever sing its praises.

FARMERS OPPOSE TAFT RECIPROCITY.

To the EDITOR OF THE PRESS:

SIR: Why oppress the American farmer, who has been between the devil and the deep sea for, lo, these many years, prior to the last one or two, and now that consumption of wheat has about overtaken production in the United States, and therefore a glimmer of hope for better times in the future appears to give him heart to struggle on, why, I ask, should his hopes be dashed to the ground by this reciprocity bill? Why should his, of all the industries of the country, be deprived of all protection? Do you think the country can prosper with the basic industry in ruin? Do you think the newspapers will prosper then even with free pulp wood?

My dear sir, mark you, if the farmer is deprived of all protection, will he vote protection to other industries? Or does the Press no longer believe in protection?

The negotiation of this astounding so-called reciprocity by a Republican administration, and supported by Republican newspapers is the most astonishing occurrence within the span of my 70 years of life. Public opinion here—and, I believe, throughout all rural regions—is practically unanimous against the measure, and fiercely against it.

This bill provides for the free dumping of 500,000,000 bushels of wheat into our land in the very near future, besides oats, barley, flax, potatoes, etc. In 1909, the Canadian northwest raised 125,000,000 bushels of wheat. That region is filling up rapidly with settlers, many of them Americans, and it is not a wild prophecy that in five years their wheat yield will be quadrupled. This reciprocity, being enacted into law, means 50-cent wheat for 50 years and correspondingly low prices for the other agricultural products admitted free.

HARTLETON, PA., April 15, 1911.

DENOUNCED BY KNIGHTS OF LABOR—AN APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AGAINST FREE TRADE WITH CANADA—DO NOT DESTROY A GREAT INDUSTRY.

THE CONGRESS OF THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
New York, April 2, 1911.

To the President and Members of Congress:

The paper industry is one of the greatest single industries in the United States of America. The capital invested exceeds $300,000,000. With an annual business of over $200,000,000, with something like 4,000,000 tons of annual production, the paper industry furnishes to the railroads in the way of freight and raw materials upward of 20,000,000 tons of freight annually. They consume 3,000,000 tons of coal, all from our domestic mines. They sustain a large number of establishments which supply them with machinery and supplies used only in paper mills. They furnish employment directly to over 100,000 men in their plants and probably 40,000 in getting out raw material in the woods and mines, besides indirectly supporting an army of men engaged in supplying them with material which they use in their manufacturing departments.

For every dollar which the consumer pays for paper it is estimated that nearly 70 cents goes to the wage fund of the country.

The whole agitation for Canadian reciprocity is due to a small syndicate of unscrupulous and selfish newspaper and magazine publishers who are desirous of increasing their already enormous profits by $5,000,000 annually through reciprocity at the expense of American labor and industry.

If finished paper is to be imported into this country free of duty, the great paper industry will be crippled, and the man who is a paper maker by trade has got to go to Canada to follow his trade, and take his wife and family into the wilderness to live, where there is no compulsory education law and not one of the comforts of civilization. It means the death blow to many communities clustered about the paper mills and the breaking up of American homes and migration of our skilled labor to Canada, and we are going to have a lot of mills on our hands that won't sell for money enough to pay the bondholders, and the Canadians are going to have our business and our profits.

Any downward revision of the tariff such as the McCall bill proposes would be unjust to both the manufacturer and the farmer of the United States, and would ultimately mean one of two things—the closing of American factories, mills, and workshops, or the American workmen will have to accept a reduction in wages to correspond with the cheaper elements of cost in foreign countries. We would therefore urge that you use your influence to defeat this iniquitous and un-American agreement.

Very respectfully, yours.

THE CONGRESS OF THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
J. R. MANSION, Secretary and Treasurer.

NATIONAL GRANGE APPEALS.

NATIONAL GRANGE, PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY,
Concord, N. H., March 28, 1911.

To the PRESIDENT:

I would submit that the facts show conclusively that the cost of producing the staple farm crops put on the free list by the Canadian reciprocity arrangement is lower in Canada than in this country. Among these facts, which can not be disputed, are the following:

1. The price of farm lands, as shown by official reports, is much lower in Canada, thus subjecting the Canadian farmer to much smaller fixed charges on his investment.

2. The wages of Canadian farm labor, as shown in an official statement prepared by the Department of Commerce and Labor, are on an average much lower than in this country. This statement gives figures showing that in the Northern and Eastern States the wages paid farm workers are from 20 to 25 per cent higher than in all sections of Canada, with the exception of the Canadian Northwestern Provinces, where wages are practically the same as in our Northwestern States. As against this equality of wages, the value of farm lands in those Provinces is not one-third the value of lands in Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, and other neighboring States.

3. The cost of the manufactured articles which the Canadian farmer buys is much lower than that of similar articles used by our farmers, because of the lower tariff taxes imposed by Canada on foreign goods. An examination of the Canadian tariff laws and preferential trade arrangements shows a difference of at least 20 per cent in favor of the Canadian farmer.

4. Owing to the fact that the farm lands of Canada are chiefly virgin soil the Canadian farmer does not find it necessary to use fertilizers to any extent, while our farmers are forced to use hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of fertilizer each year.

Respectfully,

N. J. BACHELDER,
Chairman Legislative Committee National Grange.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to disagree with my colleague and good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] on this question, but there has been in evidence in the last few days in this House the fact that every man is thinking for himself, regardless of party, and for the best interests of the people of this great country as he conceives them.

We have farmers in Lackawanna and Luzerne Counties, as good farmers as there are in any part of this country. [Applause.] Their fields may not be so fertile or extensive as in some other portions of the country, but they make up largely for this by their industry, energy, and the careful study and intelligent use of soil conditions. And we have a great market there for them. As a result of protection to American industries that market has become so great that the farmers of those two counties, and of all northeastern Pennsylvania, can furnish but a small part of the food necessary for them. [Applause.] Carloads of produce come daily from New York, the West, and South to make up the deficiency.

Now, I want to say to the farmers of this country that where the wheels turn and the furnaces are burning is your market. Originally, as I understand protection, the thought was not so much to protect the farmer against some competitor; it was to give him a market, and the Republican Party has done that. So long as the Republican Party is in power so long will the farmers of this country have a market.

Now, I am an ardent protectionist. No State in the Union has been more steadfast to this principle than the grand old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. But reciprocity with Canada will in no way violate that principle. Wages and the standard of living in that country are practically the same as in this country. This opening of the markets between us and Canada is not going to hurt the American farmer. It is going to increase our opportunities to manufacture, as our lists of exportations there show conclusively, increase our employment, and enlarge our market both at home and in Canada. The farmer in Canada has not any advantage on account of the great area in land up there. He is paying fancy prices for good farm land to-day, and if you go through that wonderful country, as I had the privilege of doing some five years ago, you will see that real estate values are booming. In the little town of Edmonton, with 12,000 people, the most northerly point reached by a railroad, business property sold there five years ago for $1,000 a foot front, and all around that place, for 2 or 3 miles, town lots were staked out; and the secretary of the board of trade told me that they had to go into British Columbia to get the products with which to feed their people.

We are not going to be harmed by this reciprocal arrangement with Canada, but will be greatly benefited. We are selling from the hard-coal lands of Pennsylvania upward of $14,000,000 worth of hard coal and $19,000,000 worth of bituminous coal and coke. We are going to make that country grow. You will see Canada grow faster than it ever grew in any period of its history—so fast that it will astound the world; and the faster it grows, the greater Canada becomes, the greater will be our market. [Applause.]

First, we ought to make this arrangement with them on account of our neighborly relations. It practically means the addition of a new State. Then there is one question that has not been sufficiently dwelt upon, and that is that we will be at peace with that nation; that not one gun or one cannon will be necessary on the boundary line between us, and making unnecessary the expenditure of vast millions in the future for that purpose. It will be a step forward to peace with the nations of the world. I want to commend President Taft for showing that he has the courage of his convictions in presenting this matter to the House with a majority against him, so far as partisan lines are concerned.

I want to commend him on account of his valor, and it will be a ten-strike in the platform on which he will be nominated and elected in 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I want also to commend him for his attitude on the question of a commission of tariff experts, showing that he is high-minded, farsighted, and nonpartisan, and that he has some faith, at least, in the good judgment of the Democratic Party on that question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I want to say to Democrats from the Southland, be careful how you move on the tariff question, because if you do what your party did a few years ago, the South, on account of its great recent industrial development, will be hurt more than the North. [Applause on the Republican side.]

From my county millions of dollars have gone into West Virginia, into Texas, Alabama, and other Southern States. I believe, however, much of this money would have been more successfully and usefully invested in Scranton and Lackawanna County, but it is now yours, and if you tinker with the tariff you are going to hurt these and other investors; you are going to deter other millions of northern money from going to your land, and without northern money and northern energy and some northern brains you can not develop the magnificent resources and utilize the splendid opportunities in your great section of country. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

One man in my county, my friends, has $600,000 invested in West Virginia coal lands. If the wheels do not turn and the furnaces do not burn, that coal does not come out of the ground. Another constituent of mine has upward of a million dollars invested in a stretch of railroad in Texas. You must have the mills and furnaces and factories going in order to give employment to the people to make railroads pay, in order to get dividends on anything, and in order to make business worth the while. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I can not hope, perhaps, to add anything that is substantial to this very remarkable debate, a debate which has been interesting and able. But I may offer a suggestion or two in the 10 minutes that I have.

The barbarians of old looked upon a stranger as an enemy. I think the old Romans had but one word to indicate both "stranger" and "enemy." But as civilization advances and men come nearer together and know each other better the tendency is in spirit always reciprocal. And if we were to trace the march of civilization from the primitive days until to-day we should find that humanity has marched toward reciprocity, at least in spirit.

This is not a perfect bill. I am frank to say that in some respects I consider it far from perfect. But I believe it is in keeping with the spirit of our age and a move in the right direction. I do not believe the subject can be disposed of by splitting hairs or even by a careful analysis of trade balances. I believe the question is ethical as well as economic, and I believe the solution of great economic questions should always be in the light of ethical or moral principles. Sound economic policies must be consistent with sound morals and with just and generous dealings between man and man.

I have been reminded a good deal, while thinking on this subject, of a story I used to tell about a fellow who went West from Maine. I can with propriety locate the story in Maine because I was born there, and I know something of the characteristics and peculiarities of some of the people. This was a case where a man went west and was very fortunate and made lots of money, and 40 years later went back to visit an old neighbor of his, and to visit generally those neighbors whom he knew and with whom he went to school. On one occasion he dropped into a little store and saw an old friend whom he had not seen for 40 years. The home-staying merchant was anxious to know how much his friend was worth and how many millions he had accumulated, and as the two sat and talked together the western man helped himself to an apple that was in a barrel by his side and ate it. Finally, when he had finished his visit, which they both had enjoyed, the western man started to go. "By the way," he said, "I took an apple here. How much are they?" The merchant stopped and hesitated a minute, and then said, "Oh, they are two for a nickel. Take another one." [Laughter.] They had not seen each other for 40 years. They had gone to school together and been boys together.

Now, in the philosophy of the thing there was a genuine sentiment of gladness in the breast of each to meet the other. There was the old-time sentiment of friendship at the bottom, but it finally had to be measured on the basis of "two for a nickel." [Laughter and applause.]

It is no new commentary on human nature. Strive as we may to give freer breath to the social and generous sentiments of our being, we fall back at last to a financial basis of action.

According to the philosophy of many, sentiment is fancy. Only selfishness is fact. With our growth will come a clearer and wider vision of life. Future generations who read the record of this debate will wonder at the fear and alarm of those who to-day picture disaster and ruin because of this well-meant effort of neighboring nations to come into closer and more friendly relations, relations mutually beneficial and healthful to both Nations.

I remember when I was a boy on the farm a couple of neighbors could not agree on a line fence. There was a variance of about 2½ inches between them as to where the line was, and they finally built a narrow lane that people used to call the Devil's Lane. I remember it well. I believe in future years we will look back at this devil's lane that stretches 3,000 miles across this great continent, a continent bearing the impress of an Infinite Father's hand, and wonder that neighbors of one blood and kindred, with one hope, one ambition, and one destiny, could not come to terms of real reciprocity. [Applause.]

But it is the same old story. I guess they are just the same over in Canada as we are here. New Brunswick is afraid of her market for potatoes and Maine is afraid, and both legislatures have passed hostile resolutions concerning this treaty. So it is all along the line, here and there, in spots; some fellow whose experience leads him to believe that he will lose a little stands against this measure. I had just as soon my boy, if he thought his future required it, would go to Alberta or Saskatchewan as to go to the Dakotas or Montana, much as I love my own country and my own flag. But there is a life, a future development of mankind on this continent that human legislation can not control. [Applause.] These great, magnificent countries are going to develop side by side one common people, and they do not need to be under one flag. A neighbor can be a neighbor under his own flag. And I believe that in spirit and principle this is right. It is even worth a sacrifice on both sides. It is a farsighted policy. It is a goal of high statesmanship.

I was born on a farm. I lived and worked on a farm until I was 22 years of age. I would not knowingly or consciously enter upon a new economic policy that would be burdensome to the great agricultural class of this country. I would not do so intentionally. I do not believe this measure will operate to the detriment of any class or any industry. Local and temporary disadvantages may result, but the general welfare will be promoted, and the permanent good of both countries will be advanced.

The social tendency of mankind is toward the cities, and it is destined to be so, for aught I see, for generations to come. There is some attraction about the city. I often wonder what it is. I often wish I could go back onto the farm, and I guess I will when I get through Congress; but the mouths to consume are increasing in proportion to our power of production of agricultural commodities. The farmer is not going to suffer in the future. The best opening and the best destiny, industrially, of any man or of any industry in this country is the future of the sound, honest, thrifty farmer, in my judgment. [Applause.] His prosperity will, I believe, be permanent. Nothing short of famine or pestilence seems likely to impede it, and even these will bring him less suffering than will come to the millions who throng the cities and who depend upon him.

I know that some strictures have been laid upon this measure as un-Republican. My good friend who sits here [Mr. DALZELL], who has led the battle for many years for protection, whose ability and courtesy I have always respected, and whom I admire as a man, seems to fear that this is not good Republican doctrine. I tell him that the Republicanism that has given life to the party is not altogether its industrial policies. It is the party of freedom and progress. The Republicanism that lives, the Republicanism of freedom, does not rest on any mere domestic policy.

I believe that with all our strength of production, with our vigor of diversified industry, we can reduce tariffs substantially and in some industries to the point of a revenue basis, and I do not believe that the future of our country or of our neighbor to the north will be advanced by longer impeding the flow of natural commerce and natural trade between these two great peoples. [Applause.]

Others have presented figures and analyzed tables and dwelt upon statistics. These may be ingeniously employed to the advantage of either side and to some extent have been during this debate. I have neither time nor inclination to dwell upon them. From as fair and impartial a summing up as I am able to make one thing appears. That is, the cost of production in Canada and the United States of the commodities affected by this bill is so nearly identical as to bring the measure within the doctrine of the Republican platform of 1908.

Imperfect though it may be, it is in the main in line with modern thought and with modern and progressive Republicanism. I shall support it in the firm faith that the future will justify it, and that vast and general benefits will flow to all our people and to the generations yet to be.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I wish to talk on one or two points. I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, because I have stated my views quite freely on other occasions. As preliminary I might say that my friend who just spoke [Mr. NYE] appealed to sentiment, and in his inimitable style ridiculed as sordid those who oppose this treaty. It is true generally that in this discussion there has been an appeal to sentiment rather than sense, ridicule rather than reason. But, gentlemen, it seems to me the question for us to settle can not be solved by such means. Sentiment will not satisfy the man that is robbed nor ridicule deter him from retaliating against unfair treatment. Reciprocity between our people should be our first consideration. This is an act to help special interests at the expense of our farmers and to help the cities at the expense of the country. Yes, but they tell us that the farmers can not be hurt, because it is insisted that the price of farm products are fixed in foreign markets. This assertion, though absolutely ridiculous as to most of the products with which this treaty will place us in competition with Canada, has been repeated over and over again in this discussion.

If the domestic price of wheat is fixed by the export price, then the price at Minneapolis should be the foreign price less the cost of placing it on the foreign market. The Interstate Commerce Commission a day or two ago gave me the export freight rate from Minneapolis to New York at 13.8 cents per bushel by the all-rail route and 11.8 cents by the lake-and-rail route; and the Department of Commerce and Labor says the ocean rate from New York to Liverpool has been from 4 to 5 cents per bushel during 1910. This makes a total freight rate of 18 cents per bushel, rail and ocean, and 16 cents by lake, rail, and ocean routes. This is just about what it has been in the years past. I will print in connection with these remarks tables which I obtained from the Department of Commerce and Labor. These tables give the prices of wheat at Minneapolis, Winnipeg, and Liverpool since September 1, 1909. They show that during 18 out of the 20 months wheat at Minneapolis was too high priced to permit of the export of a single bushel. For three months it was higher than the Liverpool prices. In the face of this fact, can anyone contend that Liverpool fixed the price of our wheat during that time? Like tables can be had for a number of years in the past. Everybody who has lived in my section of the country and paid any attention knows that this is true, as newspapers in their market reports have constantly called attention to it.

In the Minneapolis Journal, one of the leading newspapers of that section, which I received this morning, is a statement that wheat is still too high for foreign export.

Canada exports nearly all the time, and their prices are consequently much lower than the United States.

The President in two different speeches has stated that prices of wheat and other cereals are from 10 to 15 cents higher in Minneapolis than Winnipeg. He might have called attention to the fact that in 1905 the difference in price of wheat was 22 cents and that Minneapolis then imported from Canada more than 3,200,000 bushels, upon which a duty of 25 cents per bushel was paid. Only about half a million bushels of this was afterwards exported. The recent report of the Tariff Board, made upon careful investigation of prices, sustains the statement of the President as to this difference, not only as to wheat but also barley, flax, and other farm products, and no one has seriously attempted to dispute the fact. Some cheap attempts have been made to deceive the farmers by comparing prices of some products in eastern Canada with prices on this side in the Middle West, but such comparisons deceive no one, not even those who engage in that pastime. Some have claimed that the difference in prices only applies to small localities, but this is clearly disproved by the President's statement and by the report of the Tariff Board.

That report shows higher prices than Winnipeg, not only at Minneapolis but also at Kansas City, St. Louis, Chicago, and other large grain markets of this country. To talk about Minneapolis and Winnipeg, the two greatest primary wheat markets of the world, as local in character, is about as absurd as anything can be. Anyone that knows anything about the wheat trade knows that Minneapolis fixes the price of nearly all our spring wheat and buys large quantities of winter wheat from Kansas and Nebraska. Winnipeg is the gateway for all of western Canada, and dominates that market. Equally ridiculous is the suggestion made by some that the difference between Minneapolis and Winnipeg is due to lack of elevator or transportation facilities. This suggestion is a mere insinuation. The Tariff Board found nothing upon which such a claim could be based. The wheat prices of Winnipeg are for wheat in store at elevators in Fort William or Port Arthur, and not for wheat located at Winnipeg. These great terminal elevators are as able to handle grain as Minneapolis, and they have the same freight rate for foreign export as Minneapolis and Duluth.

But the argument mainly relied upon to show that prices are not affected by the tariff is that we export large quantities. This fallacy has done duty for many years, and I presume we ought to approach it with the reverence due to its age. The vice of the argument is that it entirely ignores actual conditions.

If all the wheat was of one quality, located at the same spot, and had to be sold on the same day the contention would be very persuasive, but that is not the situation. You may overload and depress the market for a month or two until it gets low enough for export and a few bushels may be exported, still during the rest of the year, while more than four-fifths of the crop is being marketed, our prices may be too high for export. This surplus may be in Kansas or Nebraska without affecting the prices at Minneapolis or other large markets. This is the usual situation. Then again you may have a wheat that can not be sold to advantage in this country, because of its character. This is true of the durum wheat; as a consequence it does not compete to any great extent with our other wheat in the domestic market. It is about the only export that has come from the spring-wheat section in years. The Agricultural Department says that for the year ending June 30, 1911, more than 20,000,000 bushels of this wheat either as wheat or flour was exported.

The total export of wheat and wheat flour during the calendar year of 1910 was equal to about 62,000,000 bushels, of this about 24,000,000 bushels was exported as wheat, the balance as flour. The Pacific coast exported last year wheat and wheat flour amounting to approximately 17,000,000 bushels. This wheat does not come in competition with wheat raised east of the Rocky Mountains where you propose to dump Canadian wheat, as the freight rates are too high to make such competition possible.

Now, let us deduct from the 62,000,000 bushels this 17,000,000 bushels. This leaves 45,000,000 bushels. Deduct from this the durum wheat, 20,000,000, and you have left some 25,000,000 bushels. Nearly all of this 25,000,000 bushels goes out as a low-grade flour, for which there is a very poor market in the United States. The reason why the higher grades do not go to foreign countries is well known. Nearly all the wheat that enters the foreign trade, except that from Canada and the durum from the United States, is a soft winter wheat of poor quality. To make a good flour from this it is necessary to mix it with a higher grade. For some years Europe imported high-grade flour for this purpose, but soon found it more profitable to mix the high grades of wheat with the low grades of wheat. This not only gives better results, but is otherwise more advantageous.

When you come to consider that this export comes in small lots, at different times of the year, and is of the character that I have suggested, there is no difficulty in understanding why the tariff affects the price of wheat. The difference in prices between Canada, the United States, and Liverpool is an absolute demonstration of this effect. But let me call your attention to other farm products. Wheat is but one and to many sections not the most important.

No one has contended that any foreign market fixes the price of our barley, flaxseed, rye, buckwheat, oats, hay, potatoes, butter, cheese, eggs, and the like. Barley is in many sections more important than wheat. The United States produced some 162,000,000 bushels last year. Of this an amount no greater than that produced in a single township in my section was exported from the east half of the United States. A small amount was exported from the Pacific coast, but that barley can not come in competition with barley raised in the great agricultural section of our country, as the freight is 50 cents a hundred pounds from the Pacific coast to Minneapolis. The brewers are about the only ones that will profit by Canadian barley. We produced 33,000,000 bushels of rye last year. Of this less than 20,000 bushels went beyond our borders during that time. The distillers of rye whisky smile over the prospects that cheaper Canadian rye will add to their profits. Flaxseed is another important crop. Until last year we produced enough for home consumption, but as prices had not been sufficient to pay for production, the acreage decreased; this in connection with a small crop in North Dakota left the home market short. We exported last year less than $7,000 worth and imported more than $18,000,000 worth. Canada has the soil and situation to put our farmers out of the business of raising flaxseed. Barley and flax usually sell in Winnipeg for about 20 cents per bushel less than in Minneapolis.

Our production of buckwheat, oats, potatoes, hay, butter, cheese, eggs, and the like is just about equal to our home consumption. There is no export of any consequence of any of these. Those who are in favor of this treaty have studiously tried to force wheat to the front as the only article affected. Is not this a trick to divert attention from the real issue? It will not only affect every article that I have enumerated, but every farm product, both North and South. The opening of the Mississippi Valley took from eastern farmers hundreds of millions of dollars. It gave you ruined farms, deserted homes. You propose to open another empire of rich soil, in which plant food has been stored for untold centuries, and let our farmers, who are compelled to fertilize their soil and expend on it very much more labor than is required on new land to produce a crop, compete, and at the same time you expect them to support a system of protection for the factory. You have promised him different treatment. You may have the power to make him submit, but are you sure that it will profit you? If he was getting an undue advantage he might not find fault; but there is no class of our citizens that receive as little reward for toil or privations as does the farmer. The Agricultural Department, in Farmers' Bulletin No. 437, just issued, says that—

In actual practice and for many reasons not foreseen at the outset the average profits in farming, aside from the rise in the value of the land itself, are not large, but on the other hand extremely modest.

This was also the judgment of the Senate committee that recently investigated this subject.

This proposition is not fair and should not pass. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, this debate on Canadian reciprocity has had a wide range; it is well that it has, and proper that it should. This is a momentous question, and one affecting for benefit or injury all of our people.

I protest against the attempt to close this debate or the fixing of a date to close until each and every Member on both sides of this Chamber who so desires has had ample time to express his views on this great measure. Neither the Democratic nor the Republican Party can afford to suppress full and free discussion in debating a question of such importance as this. I have no apology to offer for having asked for an hour on this question, even though a new Member. I am as much concerned, and my constituents as much interested, as if I had served here for 30 years. I can not help feeling, as I hear men asking for time and unable to secure time enough fully to express themselves, that they have the right to demand it.

What is the pressing need for a hurried vote on this question? Will it not stand investigation? Do you think you are currying any favor from the farmer or anybody else by shutting off debate on a question of such vital importance to him as is this?

SOMEWHAT OF A "RUBE" MYSELF.

One of the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber referred to the farmer yesterday as a "Reuben." Well, I am a "Rube" myself.

When this report reaches the Farmers' Cooperative Union and the great grange organization of this country, they will have something to say about the short time given to debating a question of such importance that a special session of Congress was called to consider it. The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, and others here, have given a great array of figures to justify the passage of this measure, covering the relative conditions in the two countries, scale of wages paid, and so forth, attempting to show that there is no discrimination against the farmer, but there was one item they failed to take into consideration. Otherwise I would pay no attention to their glittering array of figures.

They failed to count in the cost of the fertilizer that thousands and thousands of our farmers have to use. The North, East, and the South are full of fertilizer factories. The great packing houses of our country put it out by thousands of tons. The newspaper farmer, the banking farmer, the factory farmer, and, very often, the statistical farmer do not always take this item into account, but the bona fide farmer does.

I venture to say that thousands of our farmers pay out more per acre for fertilizers than it costs thousands of Canadian farmers to put in and harvest their crops per acre. Do you think in cases like that they can compete on a free-trade basis with him?

WHAT PRICES DOES LIVERPOOL FIX?

We have heard much about Liverpool fixing prices. Liverpool does not fix the price on apples in the United States, does it? It does not fix the price of barley, does it? It does not fix the price of hay, does it? Or of potatoes? No; nor of wheat, except to a limited extent, and every intelligent farmer knows it. There are many factors affecting prices all the time, but the farmer does know that 25 cents tariff on the bushel protects him against the competition of Canadian wheat.

I am only a plain farmer, one of that class whom the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber and some of those on this side are trying so hard to convince will not be hurt by the passage of a measure of this kind.

I wish to say to those on this side of the Chamber, who are mostly high protectionists for the manufactured products of their States and communities, and who are now arguing this heresy of the farmer's product going on the free list against the only country he has any need to fear as a competitor in nearly all that he produces, that they are either inconsistent now or else must admit they have for many long years been attempting to flimflam the farmer by word, act, and acquiescence in this protection to his industries.

CAN FARMERS BE BLAMED FOR SUSPICIONS?

Can you blame the farmers of this country for doubting your sincerity? Who constituted you the arbiters of his fortune and the judge of what would be his benefit? And I will say to the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, who are arguing along the same lines, that as a party they are as inconsistent.

Under your great Wilson bill, when you had the opportunity to carry out these free-trade heresies, did your party improve it? No.

That law carried protection to all farm products, as did the McKinley law. It is true it reduced the rates on those products, as it did in common with other schedules. Did those reductions help anybody or the Government? No.

The effect was exactly the opposite. Why did not your party, when it had the opportunity, put all farm products on the free list, including hemp, cane, cotton, peanuts, with all the products of the South and North? You are very solicitous for the welfare of the farmer, and you also desire to tickle the consumer. It is politics you are playing, and you no more desire free trade as a party than do these proselytes, now your colleagues on this side of the Chamber, and you are attempting to bunco the farmer as well as they are.

Mr. Chairman, some of the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber and the Democratic press of the country have criticized the insurgent Republicans for working hand in hand with the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON and other so-called standpat Republicans on this great question.

I have no doubt it gives them a pain to find that most of those insurgents who rebelled against so-called usurpation of power by not only Mr. CANNON, but by other Speakers who preceded him, who took different views on methods of procedure and revising the rules of the House that he and other gentlemen did, to find that when it came to great questions like the present one, a proposition that carries with it a vital principle involving not only the financial but the moral interests of the country that these insurgents were still Republicans.

INSURGENTS WOULD CORRECT ABUSES.

The so-called insurgent Republicans are progressive. They want to see the Republican Party correct any abuses that have grown up within the party and the Nation during its long and I will say glorious life. No other political party on earth can point with pride to the achievements along all lines of human endeavor as those that have been written on history's pages during the life of this great party. If the Democrats of this country thought a difference of opinion on some questions was going to cause a split in the Republican Party, that progressives would forsake the party of Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley, those three great martyrs, the party of Grant and Sumner, of James G. Blaine, Oliver P. Morton, and other noted statesmen, they must have been grievously disappointed.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Republican Party is to be congratulated that it contains an element of progressiveness, just as I think the Democratic Party should thank God that they have insurgents and progressives in their party, for they are the balance wheels that prevent parties from going to destruction, and it is necessary that we have great political parties.

Mr. Chairman, the South has thousands of farmers, broad-minded, well-informed men, who have within the last few years awakened to the necessity of cooperation. I have met many of them and have the good fortune to belong to the same fraternal and economic unions that many of them do. I have learned to appreciate their sterling qualities, their sense of honor, and their liberality in reciprocal relations between our order in different parts of our common country.

I have traveled to some extent in the Southland, through the Virginias, Carolinas, and through Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky. It is a wonderful land. But much of it shows the effects of one to two hundred years of use. The farmers who are so bravely trying to meet the responsibilities of life, rear their families, and maintain their high moral and social standards under the conditions incident to a depleted soil are worthy of all honor and consideration and the highest respect of their countrymen.

SENTIMENT HOLDS SOUTHERN FARMERS.

As I traveled through parts of the South and contrasted their farms and farm land with that of the boundless West I was prone to say: "God pity them; their condition in life is hard indeed. Why do they stay here when they can do so much better in the West or in Canada?" And then the words of Scott's poem, in his Lay of the Last Minstrel, came into my mind:

> Breathes there the man with soul so dead
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!

And the question was answered, this was home—the magic word "home." To-day, as ever, every rightly constituted man and woman, wherever they are and whatever their station, long for home, sweet home. Thousands have left the Southland to make their homes in the North and West, and while they have prospered and grown rich there, they still exclaim of the States of their birth: That "is my own, my native land!"

I have talked with many of them and heard their stories, contrasting the ofttimes struggle for existence on many of the farms of the East and South with their condition of peace and plenty in the West.

Mr. Chairman, being a farmer myself and, I think, understanding farming conditions fairly well in all sections of this Union, I will never knowingly support a measure that discriminates against the farmer or strikes at his welfare as a class, even though I know some of them would be benefited thereby.

NO WHEAT, BUT POLITICIANS.

The gentleman from North Carolina said they did not raise wheat down in his State; and his own lack of knowledge of the industry proves that he at least never raised it, or is in any way informed on the subject. But they do raise wheat, cotton, corn, hemp, sweet potatoes, tobacco, fruit, and many other products, and some of their politicians do raise "h" with a dash and an "l."

I desire to warn the Members from West Virginia, Virginia, and all of those States that are putting out thousands of acres of apples that Canada raises apples, and has hundreds of thousands of acres of as good apple land as there is in the world, and their apples are better keepers than those raised in southern climes. I will give you apple statistics a little later.

I think your southern apple and tobacco raisers, your growers of cane, cotton, and rice, of cattle, sheep, and wool, and all other products are deserving of protection against the products of any foreign country that might come in competition with them. Your country raises some of the products that Canada does. In tobacco and apples she would become a great competitor with Canada under free trade. As far back as the year 1901 Canada produced 11,266,732 pounds of tobacco, as shown by the Canadian Year Book of 1909, and the same authority shows that in 1906 she had 155 tobacco manufactories capitalized at $15,274,923.

WHY NOT FREE-LIST SUGAR?

In this famous compensation bill which you have introduced as a sop to the farmer are you putting tobacco and tobacco products on the free list? Thousands of them use it, as well as do other thousands of our citizens. Canada also has sugar factories and can raise sugar beets in any quantity. You could probably benefit Canada and the American consumer if you would put sugar on the free list. Do you intend to do it in this compensation bill of yours?

Our farmers all use sugar when they have the money to buy it; so does the great mass of the people you call the consumer, though the farmer is the heaviest consumer of any one class because there is more of him. If you want to help those poor consumers in the tenements and factories, do you not think they would get as much benefit from free sugar as from free potatoes?

The farmer is not altogether a hog, although he raises a few. He does not ask for special reductions in his favor. All he asks is a square deal for all the people. You can not fool him with this compensation bill of yours that does not compensate. Quit playing politics and play ball.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina points with pride to this as a Democratic measure. I am very willing they shall father it, and I very much regret that a Republican President has seen fit to champion so unjust and nonmeritorious a measure as this so-called reciprocity fiasco. He is a great lawyer, an eminent jurist, and an authority on government, but doubtless has had but little time to give to economic questions.

His environment and occupation have been such that, evidently, he has given little thought to agricultural questions, and in this case we consider he has been very unfortunate in his advisers.

If we refer to the table of articles on which Canada would have to remit to us on 1910 business under this agreement, we find that United States coal shippers would be benefited to the extent of $455,246, a little more than one-sixth of the money that Canada would have to remit under this act.

GOOD THING FOR MINE OWNERS.

And while this would be a good thing, no doubt, for some of the American mine owners, and so forth, it is no help in the world to that large coalless region lying contiguous to Canada's immense coal fields. Canada has a rate of 53 cents the ton against the United States rate of 45 cents the ton, and Canada did make a rate reciprocal with ours, or 45 cents the ton, but no consumers of coal in the United States are benefited thereby. Still, one-sixth of the business on which Canada remits is coal.

I have heard much said about this measure, but as yet I have never heard one word that shows any crying need for it or any valid reason why it should not be amended and made a just reciprocity measure, or else defeated.

The cry is made that the exactions of the Paper Trust are grievous. Are they more grievous than a great many others whose products are really benefited by this measure? I have not heard any reason assigned for the fisherman's products being placed on the free list. The framers of this measure have tried to justify themselves with the farmer, but not the fisherman. I presume the difference is caused by the farmer's much larger voting number. They need to fool him, but the fisherman politically can not figure very heavily, so it is not necessary even to apologize for placing his products on the free list.

When this measure passed the House last winter, 2,100 Gloucester fishermen placed their flags at half-mast, and well they might. Canada, with its relatively smaller population, has the same fishing possibilities as this country, and our fishermen already feel its competition. According to the statistics we have here, Canada exported of dutiable fish of all kinds to the United States in 1910 more than 73,000,000 pounds, while the United States sent into Canada less than 4,000,000 dutiable product.

SACRIFICES FISHERMEN FOR MANUFACTURER?

Does the sponsor of this bill in the House [Mr. MCCALL] feel that the fishermen of his State are not as worthy of consideration and protection as are its manufacturers?

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the principle of protection to American manufacturers on the basis we have conducted it has been shamefully abused, but as against that abuse and absolute free trade for our country, I think the latter would work to our people far greater calamity than have the abuses under the former.

I believe in tariff revision. I believe in an effective tariff commission that will check the abuses that have long years existed under the system. But while I think absolute free trade would be a calamity, yet from the viewpoint of justice and right, is much more defensible than this attempt to single out three or four of our industries and arbitrarily place them on the free list.

Mr. Chairman, I do not consider it justifiable to try and correct something we regard as a commercial mistake by committing an act of injustice or a moral wrong. I raise my voice here against the attempted rank injustice done to each and every interest being discriminated against under this treaty. As I have said, I am a farmer. I am a member of the Grange and the Farmers' Union, and have been a member of every farmers' organization of any scope we have had in the United States for the last 30 years. I know how they as a class feel about this measure. I am in receipt of petitions that represent the desires of thousands of farmers on this question, and those in favor of this measure are in the proportion of about 1 to 1,000. These petitioners are farmers who represent all political parties.

The Farmers' Union and Grange of the North, East, West, and a part of the South are against this discriminating treaty. Even though in some cases it might benefit some of them, they object to the unjust features of the measure.

Mr. Chairman, the cry of the Members on that side of the House that this is a blow at protection is not borne out by the effect of the Democratic reciprocity measure which was on the statute books of this country from 1854 to 1865.

It had the same free trade provisions, and the only thing it demonstrated to this country was that Canada had vastly the better of the deal, and that at a time when its agricultural production was not a drop in the bucket to what it is now, and when its chance for the better of the treaty was nothing to what it is at the present time, nor is it now a drop in the bucket to what it will be in the future.

On most of the articles Canadians can not raise Canada refused to reciprocate. It puts some fruits and vegetables on the free list, for it, in a greater or less degree, raises most of them, but oranges, lemons, pineapples, and fruits of that kind it refused to let in free. They were entirely too good revenue getters, and it would likewise offend some other nations with which Canada does business if it discriminated in favor of the United States.

CANADA WINS BY TEMPTING SOUTH.

The only wonder is that Canada put cottonseed oil on the free list. Those long-headed Canadian statesmen must have realized that they would have to concede something to our Southland or fail of its support for this measure. Accordingly they put cottonseed oil on the free list and made a very substantial reduction on peanuts. Thus on the basis of 1910 business Canada would remit on those two products $219,223.85, which is between 11½ and 12 per cent of the entire amount Canada would have to remit.

Now, while I have referred to this I do not for one minute think this is influencing the vote of any Member on that side of this Chamber, whatever I may think of other motives, probably not so worthy, influencing some of them.

I am sure of one thing, and that is that it did not influence Senator JOSEPH W. BAILEY, of Texas, when he said on the floor of the Senate last winter that he would never support a measure so unjust to the American farmer as this one.

Mr. Chairman, in looking up the meaning of the word reciprocate, in order to be sure that I was giving to the word its true meaning and not simply what I myself thought it should mean, I found that Webster gives as the logic of reciprocating, "A proposition which asserts subject and predicate to be equal and identical in extent."

Taking Webster as an authority for the meaning of the word, I want to say that the title of this bill is a misnomer; that in few particulars are there any truly reciprocating features in it.

In my judgment it should be entitled "An act of discrimination against certain classes of our people in favor of Canada."

There are several propositions involved in this question, and the one that naturally appeals to us is the financial side, but in passing laws the Congress of the United States is never justified in passing them purely for financial reasons when there is a moral consideration at stake of vastly more importance to the Nation than is the mere question of dollars and cents.

By what ethics can we justify the singling out of three or four of our industries and putting their products or output on an absolutely free-trade basis, leaving other industries as fully protected as before? Is there any justice in such action?

FEW CLASSES SACRIFICED.

Yet this is what the proposed measure does. By what right do we, as Representatives, take a measure of this kind, negotiated by men, but few if any of us ever heard of until this measure came up—I mean those who represented the Department of State—Mr. Pepper and Mr. Davis, who went up to Ottawa and there framed this measure that would depreciate in value the property of part of our people for the benefit of another part of our people and the Canadians and their Government?

Mr. Chairman, a measure of this kind, of such vital importance to our governmental welfare and the welfare of vast numbers of our people, is a thing which should not be entered into hastily, its essential features trusted to untried and uninformed men. Neither should it be passed through Congress by any such hurry-up methods and urging against the amending and correcting of the unjust features of the measure as was practiced and urged at the last session of Congress. I also question the moral right of any political party to go into caucus and agree to pass a drastic and unreasonable measure like this for political expediency, or to make such an attempt.

Mr. Chairman, I found on my desk a few days ago a pamphlet from the Government Printing Office, headed "Canadian reciprocity; extracts from the Daily Congressional Record from January 26, 1911, to March 4, 1911." Among these extracts I find one from the speech of the Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, in the House of Representatives, February 14. I desire to read an excerpt from that speech. The gentleman from Alabama says:

> Now as to agricultural machinery and meat. Of course I recognize that this bill is not properly balanced when you put cattle on the free list and leave a prohibitive tax on meat, as you do in this bill. But I want to call your attention to this fact: Suppose you put meat coming from Canada on the free list, would you get any meat to the consumers in this country? Not at all. The Canadians do not produce enough meat for their own people. A little might come over the border here and there, but it would not affect the price of meat in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I have not the pleasure of Mr. UNDERWOOD'S acquaintance. I have no doubt but that he is an honorable, upright gentleman, and I would not for one minute impugn his motives in making this declaration; but I am inclined to think he made that statement from some preconceived ideas in the matter and not from any statistical facts. While, no doubt, he thought he was right, I think, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand a document which will prove to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Alabama that he was wrong. I have here a copy of the Canadian Yearbook for 1909. On page 124 of this book I find, under the heading of "Trade and Commerce, Table XXIX," information regarding the total amount of meat Canada exported to all countries during the years 1905 to 1909, inclusive.

CANADA LARGE MEAT EXPORTER.

According to this table put out by the Canadian Government, the minimum amount of all classes of meat Canada has exported in any one of the years from 1905 to 1909 is 83,909,745 pounds, and the maximum amount exported in any one year 163,481,589 pounds, and a total for five years of 574,427,970 pounds.

We find in the list of meats shipped by the United States to Canada last year that all kinds of meats—fresh, dressed, dried, salted, barreled, and canned, including chicken—only a total of 18,119,642 pounds, less than one-fourth of the amount Canada exported in any year from 1905 to 1909, both years inclusive.

The gentleman from Alabama was under the impression that Canada could not raise enough meat for its own consumption. You can not judge of the possibilities of a country altogether by its exports and imports, and the fact that Canada imported some meat from the United States was no proof that it could not produce enough meat for its own use. Some of the speeches made in the Sixty-first Congress, as well as in the present Congress, in favor of this measure show an amazing lack of information as regards Canada, or else a willful desire to fool the American people, and this is another reason I am against this principle of attempting to decide the fate of a measure like this or any other by a caucus.

A few men generally control these caucuses, fix their policy, and largely destroy the incentive of their members to investigate conditions for themselves. In other words, the caucus destroys their initiative, and they become automatons or pawns on the chessboard. This for the defenders of that system on both sides of this Chamber.

Mr. Chairman, in this same pamphlet of extracts, already referred to, I find a speech of Senator Carter, of Montana, delivered in the United States Senate, in which he presented some excerpts from the statements made by Mr. Pepper and Mr. Davis as to where the Canadian reciprocity measure benefits the farmer; they tell how many more vegetables the United States ships to Canada than Canada to us, and how this is going to help the farmer. He also refers to shipments of fruits.

WHAT PERSONAL EXPERIENCE SHOWS.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a fruit and vegetable grower for some 14 years, and I have exported by the carload into Canada, and presume I understand Canadian conditions and possibilities as well as Mr. Pepper and Mr. Davis do. I will not attempt to say that there will not be some cases where American shippers would benefit under a reciprocal agreement that puts fruits and vegetables on the free list, but on the whole, with my knowledge of Canada's possibilities as to production of those fruits and vegetables that can be raised in that climate, in my judgment the United States producer will lose infinitely more than he will gain by this arrangement.

There is a widespread opinion that Canada can not raise fruit to any extent, and while part of the data I have on this subject is somewhat old, much of it is up to date. This is what Canada produced in fruit from 1871 to 1901, according to the Canadian Yearbook of 1909:

	1871	1881	1891	1901
Apples.....bushels..	6,365,315	13,377,655	7,519,913	18,626,186
Peaches.....do....	.....	.....	43,637	545,415
Pears.....do....	.....	.....	229,240	531,837
Cherries.....do....	.....	.....	192,369	336,751
Plums.....do....	.....	.....	266,350	557,875
Other fruits.....do....	358,963	841,219	320,641	70,396
Grapes.....pounds..	1,126,402	3,896,508	12,252,331	24,302,634
Small fruits.....quarts..	.....	.....	.....	21,701,791

In 1910 Canada shipped 8,126,984 pounds of dried apples, 1,604,477 barrels of apples, which is nearly 5,000,000 bushels.

If Canada has increased in the same proportion in the last 10 years that it did in the other decades referred to, it produces now something more than 30,000,000 bushels of apples, and we suppose other fruits in proportion. While this is not much fruit the possibilities of enormous accessions to this supply are staring the United States producer in the face, and even now the throwing of 10,000,000 or 15,000,000 bushels on the American market would materially decrease the price of apples to the United States producer in the fall of the year when the majority of these fruits are marketed.

He refers to cottonseed oil, and there, Mr. Chairman, I admit there will be a distinct gain to our people. Already Canada is using large quantities, and putting this on the free list should help the cottonseed oil mills, and Canada can not produce it under natural or advantageous conditions, and if the United States could allow some product of Canada that would not interfere with the living or welfare of some of our own people to come in free as an offset, it would be fair and just reciprocity, and carrying out the ideas of reciprocity as advocated by James G. Blaine and William McKinley. Neither of them ever hinted at such reciprocity with Canada as is contemplated by this measure.

Mr. Pepper and Mr. Davis refer to sheep as follows:

> The sheep raisers of the United States would be materially benefited by getting their sheep into Canada free. The Dominion, through its department of agriculture, is now taking means to increase the Canadian supply of sheep. Under the present tariff of 25 per cent sheep to the value of $220,000 imported into Canada from the United States have paid duties in excess of $50,000.

INTERESTING FACTS OVERLOOKED.

These gentlemen failed to tell in this connection that the United States, on sheep imported into this country from Canada, collected duties amounting to $103,519, and that Canada exported to this country about three times as many sheep as we sent there. If this becomes a law the United States sheep man is certainly worsted, as under this act vast herds can be driven down from Canada in the early spring into the United States, for there is no restriction. After shearing time they can be driven back into Canada, thus putting large quantities of Canadian wool on the free list as well as sheep, and becoming equal competitors in wool sales with our American growers.

The statement has been made on the floor of this House that the American negotiators of this measure desired to put meats and meat products, as well as flour, on the free list, but that Canada would not agree to it. The idea that Canada, which is trying to build up its industries and manufactures, would reject a proposition that would give employment to labor and open up a 92,000,000-people market against their 7,000,000 who have immense quantities of grain in excess of their own needs and have only made a start on their possible production, would refuse to put flour on the free list is too incredible for belief. The same might be said of meat products. If Canada can furnish the United States with the animals, they surely need not fear for their home market, but should jump at the twelvefold greater one.

If Canada did so refuse, our representatives at the drafting of this measure would have been perfectly justified in refusing to indorse the agreement. I maintain, without any fear of successful contradiction, that the admission of their raw products above mentioned into the market of the United States gives the great milling industries of our country, the Meat Trust, and other protected industries a chance to use the Canadian product to hammer down the price of the United States product without any necessity whatever for their giving to the consumer an equal reduction.

ADVOCATES OF MEASURE INCONSISTENT.

These reciprocity disciples say in one breath that our people need all the flour and breadstuffs they can get, and in the next, "We are the largest exporters of wheat in the world."

If this is right, why this crying need? One assertion refutes the other. If it is true, there is only one need we could possibly have for Canada's products, and that is to use as a club to hammer down American prices, which it would naturally do.

Let us be honest with each other and the country. No individual or party can afford to carry a measure by misstatement of facts or by attempting to mislead the class which has all to lose by this arrangement.

Mr. Chairman, the two subordinates of the State Department who negotiated this treaty for our country, these gentlemen to fortune and fame unknown, give us "Wheat values and reciprocity" as follows:

The wheat crop of the United States in recent years has varied from 550,000,000 to 750,000,000 bushels per annum. The present production of Canada is from 100,000,000 to 160,000,000 per annum. Optimists as to Canada's possibilities in wheat raising go so far as to estimate her wheat crop, when the Northwestern Provinces have been more thoroughly settled, at twice and even three times her present production. It is safe to assume that the Canadian surplus of wheat for the immediate future will amount to from 40,000,000 bushels to 100,000,000 bushels per annum. The price of wheat in the United States generally averages as to the northwestern crops fully 10 cents per bushel, and sometimes so much as 15 cents per bushel, higher than in the corresponding sections of Canada. The effect of the removal of the duty on wheat will be advantageous to Canada in that her wheat will be placed substantially on a parity with values in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have given these figures of the negotiators of this treaty as to wheat values in the United States and Canada especially for the benefit of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who so persistently, and I might say so insolently, branded all those asserting this difference in price as falsifiers.

Now, as to their claim regarding Canada's possibilities in wheat raising, I wish to read an excerpt from the report of a Canadian senate committee to their Parliament after scientific examination into Canada's lands and other resources:

Within the scope of the committee's inquiry there is a possible area of 656,000 square miles fitted for the growth of potatoes, 407,000 square miles suitable for barley, and 816,000 square miles suitable for wheat. * * * There is a pastoral area of 860,000 square miles, 26,000 of which is open prairie with occasional groves, the remainder being more or less wooded. Throughout this arable and pastoral land latitude bears no direct relation to summer isotherms, the spring flowers and the buds of deciduous trees appearing as early north of Great Slave Lake as at Winnipeg, St. Paul, and Minneapolis, or Ottawa, and earlier along the Peace River and some minor western affluents of the Great Mackenzie River, where the climate resembles that of western Ontario.

CANADA HAS BOUNDLESS FARMS.

And again:

Three years ago Mr. Conroy, of the department of Indian affairs, reported to a Canadian parliamentary committee that he had found excellent farms in the latitude 62 degrees 3 minutes, which is almost as far north as Iceland, farther north than the southern end of Greenland and some 800 miles north of the upper boundary of Minnesota, where he saw heavy crops of wheat, oats, barley, and peas. Before he started south, on July 28, barley cutting was already under way. He reported all kinds of wild fruits in the country, with the exception of apples, which can not be grown north of Edmonton. But even as far north as Fort Providence he picked with his own hand fine strawberries, raspberries, blueberries, and cranberries. And this is the territory even beyond that territory which Gen. Sherman once contemptuously designated as "the frozen belt."

We find that this 656,000 square miles fitted for the growth of potatoes amounts to 419,840,000 acres, and at 100 bushels to the acre—a low estimate for potatoes—gives a possible 41,984,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Yet there are people already beginning to bemoan the starvation of future generations for the lack of food. We find that the 407,000 square miles suitable to barley production is equivalent to 245,828,000 acres, which at the very low estimate of 10 bushels to the acre gives a production of 2,458,280,000 bushels of barley. Need anybody fear that future generations will run out of that very essential article from which to make beer?

We find that the 816,000 square miles suitable for raising wheat equals 522,240,000 acres, which, at the very low estimate of 12 bushels to the acre, amounts to 6,266,880,000 bushels of wheat; and yet some of our pessimistic economists are already lying awake nights pondering where future generations are going to obtain their white loaf. If but one-half of this territory were used for purposes enumerated, still at Canada's average production per acre, it would not reduce these figures.

We find that their 860,000 square miles pastoral area equals 550,400,000 acres, which, allowing 10 acres to the head, would pasture 55,040,000 head of stock. And it is quite evident that Canada will always be able to furnish its own meat supplies.

The timber, the mineral, including coal, the fisheries, and other natural resources of Canada are probably unequalled by any like-sized territory on the face of the globe, and we want to remember that it has 750,000 square miles more territory than is contained within the boundaries of the United States.

WHEAT RESOURCES OF CANADA ENDLESS.

There is one valley up in Canada that is capable of raising more wheat, or as much wheat, as Mr. Pepper claims optimists estimate for all Canada. This is known as the Peace River Valley, and is made up of 65,000,000 acres of first-class agricultural land. Of the nature of its soil Prof. Tanner, the great English laboratory agriculturist, has reported as follows:

We have hitherto considered the black earth of central Russia the richest soil in the world. That land, however, has now to yield its distinguished position to the rich, deep, black soil of western Canada. The earth here is a rich vegetable humus of from 1 to 4 feet in depth, with a surface deposit rich in nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and potash.

This one valley, which, as compared to the whole of Canada, is as the State of Missouri to the United States, is capable of producing nearly as much wheat as is now produced by the United States. It is this wonderful country, filled with such marvelous future possibilities, that our distinguished friends here who are favoring this bill desire to place in competition with our farmers and their too-often depleted soil.

In return for the privilege of shipping their raw products into the United States free, among other things, Canada has graciously made a reduction of some 14 per cent in her tariff rate on automobiles. The poor manufacturers and the consumers of that luxury will receive the benefit, and this alone should console the fishermen of Gloucester, potato raisers of Maine, dairymen of New York, and apple raisers of Michigan.

The reciprocity treaty which existed between the United States and Canada from 1854 to 1865 has been both lauded and criticized, but whether or not this was a wise or beneficent measure or a weak and discriminating one there is one fact of mathematical accuracy, and that is that the Government of Canada was the financial beneficiary and the Government of the United States the heavy loser.

SUMNER'S VIEW OF OLD TREATY.

Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, in a speech in the United States Senate, January 11, 1864, said:

I come, in the last place, to the influence of the treaty on the revenue of our country; and here the customhouse is our principal witness. The means of determining this question will be found in the authentic tables which have been published from time to time in reports of the Treasury, and especially in the report made to Congress at this session, which I have in my hand.

Looking at these tables we find certain unanswerable points. I begin with an estimate founded on the trade before the treaty. From this it appears that if no treaty had been made, and the trade had increased in the same ratio as before the treaty, Canada would have paid to the United States in the 10 years of the treaty at least $16,373,880, from which she has been relieved. This sum is actually lost to the United States. In return Canada has given up $2,650,890, being the amount it would have collected if no treaty had been made. Here is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

Here is another illustration, derived from the tables: During the 10 years of the treaty the United States have actually paid in duties to Canada alone $16,802,962, while during this same period Canada has paid in duties to the United States the very moderate sum of $930,447. Here again is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

The same inequality may be seen in another way. During the 10 years of the treaty dutiable products of the United States have entered Canada and the other Provinces to the amount of $83,347,019, while during this same period dutiable products of Canada and the other Provinces have entered the United States only to the amount of $7,750,482. During this same period free products of the United States have entered Canada and the other Provinces to the amount of $118,853,972, while free products of Canada and the other Provinces have entered the United States to the amount of $178,500,184. Here again is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

Add to these various results the statement in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has just been laid on our tables, in the following words:

"The treaty has released from duty a total sum of $42,333,257 in value of goods of Canada more than of goods the produce of the United States." (Foreign and Domestic Commerce, 1864, p. 93.)

This conclusion is in substantial harmony with that which I had reached from an independent examination of the tables.

From these various illustrations it is clear that the revenue of the United States has suffered by the treaty in question, and that in this important particular its advantages have not been shared equally by the two countries. Here, at least, it loses all title to its name.

There is an old saying that we can only judge the future by the past, and if such was the result to our Government under that treaty it would be only reasonable to suppose that the same conditions will occur again.

In this case we have only to take the tables prepared by our Government for our guidance in considering this bill to see that a like condition would exist under this treaty. We have statistical data covering all articles exported and imported from and by the two countries from each other for the year 1910 that would be in any way affected by this treaty, together with the present duty rate charged by each country; also giving the proposed reciprocal rate and the amount of money levied by the two countries on articles imported and the amount that would have to be remitted on 1910 business by each country under this agreement.

CANADA DRIVES GOOD BARGAIN.

We find that Canada imported from the United States in 1910 reciprocal products to the amount of $47,827,959, on which she collected tariff duties of $7,776,236. Of this amount Canada would have to remit under this reciprocal agreement $2,560,579. Take this from the duties collected and it leaves Canada a balance of $5,215,657 tariff revenue. We find that the United States imported from Canada during the same year products to the value of $47,333,158, on which we collected customs duties of $5,649,826. Of this amount we would have to remit under this proposed agreement $4,849,933, leaving a balance in favor of the United States of $779,893 tariff duties collected on more than $47,000,000 of business done with Canada, as against Canada's $5,215,657 on practically the same amount of business it did with this Government.

Where is our Government's reciprocal benefit from a measure like this?

We have indisputable proof here that the United States on practically the same amount of business done in Canada that Canada did with us only receives a little more than one-sixth the revenue Canada receives from us under this proposed treaty. Is it wise for our Government to go into any such treaty with these indisputable figures staring us in the face?

This is, in my judgment, not only a great moral wrong we are attempting to do a certain class of our citizens, but from the standpoint of sound business policy it looks to me to be indefensible. Canada puts on the free list all commodities on which it knows it will be able to compete with us, but with few exceptions on those articles which Canada considers are not competitive it retains duties that bring in as much revenue under this treaty as the United States collected from Canada under the old system.

I maintain that from a financial viewpoint this is not fair to our Government as an executor, and from a moral viewpoint it is not fair to our people. This measure is only reciprocity in name. It is a travesty on justice, executed for the benefit of special interests under the guise of a benefit for the masses.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States has been quoted as having said that it would check and reduce the cost of living—that it will not hurt the American farmer, will help the Canadian farmer, and reduce the cost of living to the consumer.

He may be able to fool some American producers with a paradoxical declaration of that kind, but he can not fool all of them.

BOUND TO HURT PRODUCER.

The law of supply and demand, the commercial training of a lifetime, teaches that by no natural conditions can such a thing be possible. How is it going to lower the price of food products to the consumer, yet not hurt the United States producer? There is nothing the producer can buy from Canada that would reduce his cost of living commensurate with his sacrifices. The entire line of commodities that he buys bears the same old tariff rate, with the single possible exception of rough lumber, so he can not help but suffer, the President's assertion to the contrary notwithstanding.

Is it not possible that it is largely other things our people have to buy that are responsible for their burden of high cost of living and not the food supply?

In Secretary Wilson's report for the present year he brings his discussion on the high cost of living to a close as follows:

From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer, the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays.

After the consideration of the elements of the matter it is plain that the farmer is not getting an exorbitant price for his products, and that the cost of distribution from the time of delivery at destination by the railroads to delivery to the consumer is the feature of the problem of high prices which must present itself to the consumer for treatment.

Note again that this statement is from the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson.

Some great statesmen in their wisdom, in order to get an increased business for certain manufactured articles, have seen fit to put farm products on the free list, thereby depriving the United States producer of protection against the only country he had any reason to fear—this without consulting him or giving him any representation on the supposed commission that framed this agreement.

Now they add insult to injury and belittle his intelligence by telling him that it will not hurt him, but will benefit the consumer.

WHEN FARMER IS HURT COUNTRY IS HURT.

Let us reason together and figure out whether we show good statesmanship and wise policy to treat one class of our citizens in such a high-handed and arbitrary manner. Will it pay even from a financial point of view? Suppose this agreement was entered into, and there is a consequent reduction in the cost of living. There is also bound to be a consequent reduction in the purchasing power of the United States farmer. The United States is dotted over with smiling towns and villages, the prosperity of which is directly influenced by the purchasing power of the farmer.

If this purchasing power is reduced you have immediately struck at the greatest single factor in our American prosperity. The consumer may live cheaper, but he will immediately find that his wage has decreased and his certainty of employment diminished. The trade of the retail stores of all kinds will begin to fall off, consequently it will be felt by the wholesaler in the city. The sales in agricultural machinery and other manufactured products will decrease along with diminished trade in all other lines, and the reduced purchases of home products will greatly offset the increased sale of products in Canada under this reciprocity agreement.

There will be an immediate shrinkage in farm values to keep pace with the decrease in the price of farm products. There will be an increased value of Canadian lands to correspond with the relative value of a 92,000,000-people market opened at their door. We will immediately suffer a great decrease in our circulating medium caused by the influx of American capital into Canada, as well as the loss of a great many of our good citizens who will go over there to reside and partake of their greater prosperity.

The moral effect upon our country will immediately be felt. The farm, becoming unprofitable, will cause an immediate exodus of farmers' sons and daughters to other avenues of life, thus accelerating a condition that has long been causing anxiety and commiseration among our thoughtful scholars and economists. If, in order to benefit a few manufacturers and special interests in the United States, we force this condition on the American producer, what assurances have that class that in a year or two the same interests, desiring to increase their trade with Argentina, will not enter into a similar agreement with that country, with a promised decrease in the cost of living to our consumers and assurance to the American farmer that it will not hurt him?

The American farmer has as much to gain by reciprocity with South America as with Canada, and is bound to lose in either case. The American manufacturer and special interests of all kinds would probably be willing to trade the exchange of the United States agricultural products in return for the admission of their own wares on the same principle that a man is willing to sacrifice all his wife's relatives for the good of his country.

PRIVILEGED CLASSES CRUSH AGRICULTURISTS.

It has been the history of all nations that the wealthy and privileged class controlled the Government and worked their own sweet will on the agricultural classes. This policy was usually carried out until that class became a debased peasantry. When they arrived at that point those countries speedily had their fall. This has been the history of all nationalities, and unless the governments of the present day can profit by the experience of the ages they will follow to the same end.

Some of our European countries are realizing this, and have made vast strides in amending economic laws and changing conditions among their agricultural classes. The most noted of these is Germany.

Great stress has been placed on the benefits that would accrue to the American farmer from the cattle that would be sent down from Canada to be corn fed in the United States. It is true there might some cattle be brought into this country for that purpose, but, in my judgment, they would be few and far between.

Canada may not be able to raise much corn, although in Ontario they can raise corn equally as well as in New York and Michigan, and better than in Wisconsin or Minnesota. Canada can raise oats, wheat, and barley galore, and can fatten cattle on those grains the beef quality of which is hard to surpass. When the reciprocity bill passed the House last winter cattle immediately took a tumble in price, on account of the increased supply that was going to be obtainable, and an Iowa representative, who was an extensive feeder of cattle, told me that he had ordered his sold at once, at a loss of $1,000. He was of the opinion that he would lose more if he held his cattle and the measure passed the Senate.

Wheat immediately declined some 5 or 6 cents the bushel and never rallied, but the price of flour and beef made no corresponding decline. The consumers of those two commodities received no benefits.

If gentlemen think that the Canadians would allow their cattle to go into the United States as feeders when they have unlimited feed of a splendid quality, they underestimate the shrewdness of our Canadian brother. Some gentlemen arguing on this reciprocity measure allude to the tariff between the United States and Canada as a wall, an unnatural barrier. Why any more unnatural than that between this and other nations with which we have commercial relations?

WHY ONE LINE BARRIER MORE THAN ANOTHER?

There is no more excuse for calling the line between an English colony and us an unnatural barrier than one between us and England herself, though an ocean rolls between. We can do business more expeditiously with England than we can with a large part of Canada. Even though there is only an imaginary line between us, that line is as broad as the Atlantic Ocean when it comes to a question of nationality.

There is nothing in this imaginary line bearing on the justice, injustice, or wisdom of this measure.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if we are going to hammer down the price of our own products with Canadian products, give the woolen industry, the cotton manufacturer, the Sugar and Tobacco Trusts, the United States Steel Trust, and all other protected industries free trade. They are as able to stand it as the American farmer, and there is more justice in this demand than there is in forcing this so-called reciprocity measure on the United States producer. I again reiterate there can be no gain for any part of our people that would compensate for the rank injustice done to another class.

The greatest mistake the United States can make is to start in to trade even the partial prosperity of her agricultural classes for the benefit of any other industry. If justly handled, they will be for all time to come the bulwark of this Nation, her leaders in honor and virtue. They who hold communion with nature and nature's god are apt to be good citizens, and we need the help of that leaven to keep the entire loaf wholesome.

Mr. Chairman, there are sure to be some who would benefit from a measure of this kind, for all could not lose from a financial viewpoint. Reciprocity in most any form is sure to help somebody. The question is whether or not we, as a Nation, can afford to pass a measure like this simply for a financial consideration. The principle of the thing is more to be considered than anything else. The taking away from the United States farmer all protection as against his most dangerous competitor in the manner contemplated by this act is as unjust to him as was King George's acts against the American colonies.

It is natural for all of us to be selfish in our viewpoints on questions like this. If it benefits us financially, it is easy for us to think the other fellow's view is wrong and his loss largely imaginary, while our loss or gain is very real, indeed.

WESTERN FRUIT MAN DECEIVED.

In the far West the fruit man thinks he will gain by an increased demand for his products in the Canadian treeless region. In the fruitless sections of our country it is a matter of indifference. In the East, where United States fruit products have to come into direct competition with Ontario, they are bitterly opposed to it. Anyone who is benefited by this measure considers the contention of the producers of other kinds of products as hardly worthy of consideration. All of our people who own Canadian mines or Canadian lands naturally favor this measure, and it is hard for them to see wherein it could do harm.

The people who buy paper products hope for a benefit from free pulp wood and free paper, and while they think there is concrete argument for their being benefited, it is easy for them to think the other fellow's contentions of damages are weak and unreasonable. There are some who care nothing for the losses of others if they are only sure of benefiting themselves, and there are those who say they expect to suffer a personal loss, but are willing to stand it for the sake of striking a blow at the principle of protection. They admit that this reciprocity agreement is very unjust in its provisions, but are willing to see this wrong committed in order to destroy what they regard as an unwise commercial policy.

This class is little, if any, better than those who look at it solely from the viewpoint of self-interest, for they utterly fail to take the moral effect into consideration. This is not a local question, but a national one, even though it is a question which affects every local community, and its effects should not be considered from the viewpoint of its benefit to the individual, community, or district.

What the effect is going to be upon our entire Nation, not only financially but morally, is more important, and the least thing worthy of consideration is the question of political expediency as affecting political parties or preferment. The actual welfare of the Nation is more worthy of consideration. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned for engaging the attention of this body so early in my legislative experience in this Chamber when I say that, in my judgment, there has not been in the last generation brought before the American Congress so far-reaching and enormously vital a proposition, that so universally affects the whole interests of every class of people I have the honor to represent here as this so-called reciprocity compact.

Not only is it true of my people locally, but to a greater or less degree the whole of the American people elsewhere, and especially is it true of the 30,000,000 of them who are engaged in our agricultural industry and who are producing annually food products to the fabulous value of nearly $9,000,000,000.

Kansas being chiefly and almost exclusively an agricultural region and not lagging in the good work proudly carries the banner above all other States in the production and annual value of her wheat crops, and stands near the head of the column of States in the production of corn, beef, pork, and other foodstuffs. It is not, therefore, strange that her farmers are very deeply and vitally interested in what is going to happen to their great business of stock raising and farm productions, amounting annually in value to $640,000,000, and to their bank deposits, now aggregating $150,000,000 more, when the last anchor of protection they have on their industry shall be swept away by the passage of this bill, bringing them face to face with an unknown and unascertainable competition that will come to them from the incalculable possibilities of a rapidly developing agricultural empire across our northern border, where labor is paid far less, lands one-half or less cheaper, with a fertility much greater than their own. And all this without a reciprocal morsel in return.

It may be wise to remember that we have been delegated and are here solely to legislate for the benefit of our citizens, and not foreigners, which thought should be paramount in every conscience before trying this extremely doubtful experiment that, in the light of the past, will become an additional burdensome yoke upon him who daily goes forth before the rising of the sun and is at this hour tilling the soil, and until the close of the day, for the very necessities of life which all must have—the merchant, the mechanic, the doctor, the lawyer, the preacher, the teacher, and the banker, all wait until in the sweat of his brow he has plowed, sowed, and reaped. He feeds them all.

The farmer's trade is one of worth;
He's partner with the sky and earth,
He's partner with the sun and rain,
And no man loses for his gain.
Men may rise and men may fall,
Yet, the farmer, he feeds them all.

It is of the rights of this great army of American toilers, who are contending with the very elements day by day, in sunshine and rain, in heat and cold, that should be defended from assaults from every source. They are in their fields and are not here. In this they are greatly handicapped for legislative consideration in competition with the well-organized manufacturers, wage earners, and the corporate interests of the country, for the farmers are almost wholly without organization, heretofore depending upon the inexorable law of compensation, which has always met with favor in their sight—receiving an equivalent for what they confer—and content to work out an industrial destiny without special governmental favors.

They are willing at all times to do the square thing, even to conceding some things not to their advantage if in the interests of the city toilers, but if protection is taken off of all their products, as this bill does, they want and are demanding to see it come off of the packers' products and all trust-made goods which they are compelled to buy. If it is protection, they want their share of it; if it is free trade, they want their share of that; and if it is to be reciprocity, they want it to be reciprocity.

The farmers of this country, and especially the western farmers, believe that in trade if you increase the purchasing power of a customer you thereby increase your own prosperity; and therefore they well understand that the more laborers employed and better wages paid in the mills and factories of the East and South the more consumers there will be and better prices will they obtain for their wheat, corn, beef, pork, and other food materials, the finished product of their industry.

Believing thus, they have stood firmly in the past for every measure that would throw a wall of protection around the mills, factories, and workshops in the East and South and the laborers and wage earners employed therein as against all foreign competitors; and they are now willing, if fairly treated by them, that all such industries shall be protected by that reasonable Republican doctrine, namely, the imposition of such tariff duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad with a fair profit to the investor.

Protectionists have always claimed that home competition prevented prices from becoming excessive. In recent years this natural law has been curtailed in its operation, so far as many manufactured articles are concerned, by the action of the trusts in preventing real competition in trust-made articles, and progressive Republicans have demanded not a destruction of the protective principle, but a lowering of the duty until it measured but slightly more than the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. But no one has claimed that there was not real competition in the home market as to agricultural products. The farmers have not combined. The prices of their products are still regulated by the law of supply and demand.

If this be true—and it is true, and no one will deny it—pray tell me then why the protection on the farmers' products should be the first to be destroyed? Pray tell me why it is inconsistent in those who have demanded a reduction of the tariff on trust-made articles to oppose a measure for reduction which carefully—I may say studiously—excepts them from its provisions?

The farmers are not demanding class legislation; they are asking no special favors; they are only contending that the same standard should be applied to the measure of their protection that is applied to others. They contend that the true measure of protection is the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and demand that a no more favorable method be applied to those interests which have stifled competition than to theirs, where home competition is free and unobstructed.

"Equal rights and special privileges to none." Afford the farmers this and they will ask no more.

But, let me warn the gentlemen on this floor representing the manufacturing districts of our country, who are pressing so ardently the passage of this so-called reciprocity measure, which robs the farmers of every line of protection they now enjoy. That they may cease to be liberal to your interests, become impatient under the burden you have laid upon them, forgetting the golden rule, and say unto you, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," and with some Elijah to lead them on, strike back by encompassing your walls of protection, assaulting them so fiercely that there will not be one stone left upon another, and you too will face the avarice and greed of every nation of the earth and then feel the sting of the like burden you have placed upon them.

Gentlemen of the South on this floor, who are so numerously favoring this bill, I ask you where is your fairness or consistency in hugging to your bosoms an ample protection on your sugar, rice, tobacco, and peanuts, of which last year you produced but $150,000,000 worth, and demanding and pressing the passage of this measure that will sweep away the last vestige of protection the farmers elsewhere have, who for the same period produced cereal crops alone of more than $3,000,000,000 in value. With child-like fondness you cling to a tariff on one-twentieth of this great production, and insist that the farmers elsewhere shall lose all on the remaining nineteen-twentieths, and then declare here and upon the stump with vehemence that protection is a robbery, thereby convicting you, not as accessories to the alleged crime, but as principals. Wherein can there be any justice to force the farmer to sell his cereals in a free-trade market and retain an amply protected market in which to sell your cotton, sugar, tobacco, and peanuts?

Pass this bill and you legislate in favor of the corporations, trusts, and combines everywhere by compelling the American farmer to sell his wheat in a free-trade market, so far as Canada is concerned, and when converted into flour, save to the Flour Trust a protected market of 50 cents per barrel in which to sell its products; it will force him to raise and sell his steers, the finished product of his labor, in the same free-trade market, while you give to the packer and the Beef Trust a protected market of $1.25 per hundred pounds in which to sell its meats at exorbitant prices to every family in the land; and it will force the farmer to sell all his other food products in a like free-trade market, and at the same time you carefully give an amply protected market to all manufactured food products now so completely controlled by the numerous other trusts of the country that are daily exploiting the poor of the city, the family on the farm, and everyone, by demanding an unjust tribute from them all.

Charles Sumner once said that reciprocity was a beautiful word and very pleasing to the ear, and then showed how difficult it was to put into practice generally, and condemned the Canadian reciprocity agreement of 1854, which was very similar to the proposed measure, covering like products from each country, as this one does, and which proved so disastrous to and was by the United States abrogated in 1865. Canada has been knocking at our doors ever since for a renewal of the old agreement. She has pressed her claims upon every administration from Lincoln to the present time, without avail until now. If our experiences with a like Canadian reciprocal agreement in the past is of any value, then we should not hesitate, if for no other reason, to set our disapproval upon it. Enact this measure into law and we again reverse the policy of this Government since its foundation, and especially is it true that it will overturn the policy pursued by it in the last 50 years, which has brought to it unbounded prosperity by increasing the property of the Nation from $16,000,000,000 to more than $116,000,000,000, or more than one-fourth of the wealth of the entire world. It will reverse the policy of a great majority of the leading statesmen of our country from the beginning of our Government, as advocated by Washington, Hamilton, Sumner, Morrill, Grant, Sherman, Harrison, Garfield, Blaine, McKinley, and many others who stood for a complete protective policy for the American farmer and reciprocity in such commodities only as were not and could not be produced in this country. In the light, then, of our past teachings, history, and policies, how does the proposed reciprocal agreement square itself, for it requires us to freely open up the greatest market on earth of 92,000,000 of people for an unimportant market of less than 9,000,000 of people, which is unequal, unreciprocal, and unfair?

It puts upon the free list every product of the farmer of the North and West, composing one-third of our great population, to the direct competition of an empire of farm lands as large as our own, with greater fertility, more than one-half cheaper in price per acre than American farms, with labor far lower than our own, and destined at no distant day to be producing an equal amount of farm products to that of the American farmer, if not much more.

George Harcourt, deputy minister of agriculture for Alberta, one of the several Provinces of Canada, in 1909 made this report:

> Of the country which is known the area of producing grain is 220,000,000 acres. The total area in crops last year was 11,257,870 acres, producing a total crop of 240,000,000 bushels. This is not the end. There is a great northern country, the McKenzie Basin, which is capable of producing grain. (Canadian Yearbook.)

It has been estimated that within a comparatively short time, with the encouragement this measure gives, this vast territory will produce bread enough to feed the people of the whole North American Continent. In this connection I invite attention to an address delivered in the House of Commons by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for 16 years prime minister of Canada, on March 7, 1911:

> We [referring to Canada] are above all an agricultural people. Our chief wealth is the growth of these products of the Temperate Zone. What are they? Fruits, cereals, and vegetables; and it is our boast—not an idle boast, but a boast founded upon actual experience—that in cereals, vegetables, and fruit we can, without exaggeration, beat the world.

This, too, is manifestly unfair to the American farmer, to now bring him up against such conditions, who for many weary years struggled against depression and adversity in building up the vast wealth of the Nation, and after the long-looked-for day of prosperity to him had dawned, when he was just coming into his own and reaping fair and remunerative prices for his patience, labor, and toil, to be thus sorely smitten by him whom he has in the years that are agone defended with his strong arm, to now be forced to stand with helpless hands while his lands decline in price, see the fruits of his toil sell for less, compelling him to work more and to produce more and sell more for the same amount, in order to keep the home and the farm running. This is not only unjust and unfair to him, but is gross ingratitude. The farm home is an institution and not a factory, and must go on from year to year; the same expenses must be paid from day to day. He therefore can not shut down his farm and close his home, like the mills and factories, when hard times and low prices prevail, and wait for better times as they can do.

The American farmer knows he can not close down and wait, that his industry must go on, and with courage he faces the future and with a loyal devotion to his home, country, and flag, excelled by none, every emotion of his heart pulsating with—

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty—

and realizes he owes a patriotic duty to preserve the home and farm, the hope of the land, without which this country will weaken, fail, and finally perish as nations have done in the past and be known only as they on the historical pages of time.

The American farmer is the chief factor that has created our great American market, built on her soil, in trade and commerce over her rivers and lakes and railroads of which we proudly boast, which exceeds $25,000,000,000 per year, with a production in agricultural and manufactured products four and one-half times greater than all Europe and spending more for education than all the rest of the world combined, the foreigners contributing not one cent in taxes for the maintenance of our schools, churches, roads, bridges, and all other internal improvements that go to make this great market for the use of which he heretofore has had to pay a tariff in order to enjoy the benefits thereof; but this bill, in effect, proposes to compel the American farmer to tax himself to build roads and bridges and highways, so that the Canadian may conveniently travel over them to every American farmer's door as his competitor without money or price. How reciprocal(?).

It has been admitted in debate by friends of this measure that the price of wheat in recent years in the United States has averaged somewhat over 10 cents per bushel more than in Canada, and that this proposed measure, if put into force, would either lower the price of American wheat or raise the price of Canadian wheat. If the former should happen, as intended in the bill, it would have produced a direct loss to the American wheat raiser of $74,000,000, applied to that crop of 1909, and a loss to the Kansas wheat grower last year of the vast sum of $8,500,000. And applying this to the middle and western portion of Kansas, where by skillful farming, the production of wheat, oats, and barley has been developed second to no other portion of our country, driving the arid boundary westward beyond the Colorado line, will work an irreparable injury and perhaps destruction to that industry there.

What loss would come to the American farmer on other products of his can not now be ascertained, but, as affecting one interest alone, again I want your attention to the words of Mr. Laurier when he said, in the aforesaid address:

> Then there is the cattle trade. Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. We have some yet, but it is not as large as it ought to be, because everybody knows that it has been constantly retarded by the exchange embargo put upon it some 20 years ago or so, and therefore, if we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise, in Great Britain, there is a ready market in the United States.

Great Britain, to whom Canada owes her allegiance, places an embargo on the cattle trade from Canada, and we are here now removing all embargoes as a gracious gift to her Canadian daughter. How generous(?). How reciprocal(?). How fair(?).

A few comparisons will be sufficient to establish the fact that this so-called reciprocal measure is not reciprocal in any respect, but wholly uninteral in spirit and effect:

(1) It gives to Canada a market of 92,000,000 of people, valued annually at $25,000,000,000, for a market of less than 9,000,000 of people, which is far less in proportion to her people than that of our own.

(2) It gives free trade in our great market for all Canadian farm products and refuses free lumber, coal, iron ore, and the like to the American farmer.

(3) It opens our markets freely, but does not require Canada to remove the export duty on her wood and wood pulp that we buy from her.

(4) As to the reciprocal nature of this agreement, the opinion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is worth considering. In the same address above referred to he compliments the Canadian minister of finance, Mr. Fielding, and the Canadian minister of customs, Mr. Patterson, who negotiated the agreement with our Secretary of State, and thanks these two men for having obtained from the United States such an advantageous arrangement and "having obtained it without the sacrifice of any Canadian interest." In other words, he means to say the United States gave all and Canada gave nothing in return.

(5) Pass this bill and we take a step backward among the nations of the earth, for Germany, France, Belgium, and the rest of the world have long since discarded the old reactionary policy of giving free trade in farm products, that even free-trade England is anxious to discard, which will bring dearth and depression to our agricultural industry; our rural population will surely decrease and the slogan "Back to the farm" will become obsolete, and "Go West, young man," will not take him to Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, or the great Middle West, but will be unheeded by him, and he will turn his back on the old home and country and either face toward Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta, to there swear allegiance to a king and live under another flag, or toward the overcrowded cities, to abide where slums and saloons abound, as breeding places of ignorance, lawlessness, crime, and anarchy. Such is not conducive to, but dangerous to the country's welfare.

It has been urged that this measure will lessen the price of food products and cheapen the cost of living to all; that it will lessen the value of food products of the producer, yes; but to the consumer, no. The consumer does not eat wheat, but the product of the Flour Trust; he does not eat fat cattle, but the products of the Beef Trust. Neither does he eat other raw materials of the producer, but the manufactured food products so completely controlled by the other trusts of our country. It is apparent, therefore, that this measure is not in the interest of the producers nor the consumers of manufactured food products, but in the interest of the conspiracy of organized avarice and greed; and the trusts, combines, and corporations will absorb, as additional profits, all reductions it will force from the producer of farm products long before it reaches the consumer of food products.

The greatest beneficiaries under this measure will undoubtedly be the trusts, combines, and corporatons who buy and sell the food products, both of the producer and consumer, together with the railroads who will transport these products from the Canadian fields to our midst in competition with our own home products. It is perfectly natural, therefore, that the Hills, Rockefellers, Morgans, Vanderbilts, and other captains of high finance are reported as favoring the passage of this measure, which is not only unreciprocal, but class legislation against a large body of our American citizens in favor of a foreign people, and is obnoxiously discriminative in character as against one class of our own people in favor of another, for it gives to the American farmer a free-trade market in which to sell his products and amply protects the trusts and combines of the country in their methods in the handling of the food products of our people. It forces the farmer to compete with free wheat and protects the Flour Trust on its flour at 50 cents per barrel. It gives free competition in barley for the farmer and 45 cents per hundred pounds protection to the brewer on malt barley; free competition in live stock for the farmer and $1.25 per hundred protection to the Beef Trust for its meats; free competition in free flaxseed and other oil seed for the farmer and ample protection on linseed oil and such products for the Oil Trust; free competition in horses and cattle for the farmer and protection at $1.25 per thousand on lumber for the Lumber Trust to house them; free competition in dairy products for the farmer and protection on coal at 45 cents per ton for the Coal Trust. Besides the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, and all the other products of the numerous other trusts seemed to be favored as against the American farmer, which is unfair, unjust, un-Republican, and un-American.

In placing myself in opposition to this measure, along with many others of like belief, I am not unmindful of the sensation that awaits our experiences beneath the most powerful machine of the times—the steam roller of the opposition—which is operated so skillfully by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. Unpleasant for a time it may be, but the conscientiousness of having stood for and defended the rights of the people we represent will be satisfaction everlasting. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the Canadian reciprocity bill one would be justified in the assumption that the paper manufacturers and lumbermen of the country would be forced into bankruptcy in the event of the passage of this measure. I am in favor of the Canadian reciprocity bill because the Lumber Trust and all its allied interests are opposing it and because it typifies the most advanced character of progressive legislation in behalf of the great masses of our people. [Applause.] The activity of the special interests in their endeavor to defeat this measure is a sign of the times.

We find the best thought of the Democratic Party of the Nation favoring this Canadian reciprocity bill, and there seems no question in my mind that its passage will eventually lower the cost of living to our people.

I do not think that God in His wisdom ever intended that an unnatural barrier should rise as a monument to greed, avarice, and the lust of wealth between the people of this country and their neighbors across the Canadian border. [Applause.]

What matters it if the earnings of the Lumber and Paper Trusts and their satellites are reduced if a market for the exportation of our products and the interchange of Canadian goods makes lighter the burden borne by the great masses of our toilers. [Applause.]

But above and beyond all else there is absolutely no question in my mind but what the present high and intolerant cost of living to our people can be lowered materially if we remove the present tariff walls existing between the United States and Canada and allow the wage earners of the land to enjoy the benefits to be derived from Canadian staple products.

To say that there can be no advantage in opening to the widest extent the great market upon our borders is the sheerest folly. Let me present for a moment as a fair and well-drawn illustration the actual conditions in the city of New York that have come about under the present high cost of living.

New York City has a population in round numbers of 4,700,000. It is estimated that these 4,700,000 persons spend about $2,350,000 a day for food. According to the tables of the United States Bureau of Labor the price of beef in 1909 showed an increase of 32 per cent over the average price for the 10 years between 1890 and 1900.

Bread showed an increase of 24 per cent.
Butter showed an increase of 35 per cent.
Eggs showed an increase of 42 per cent.
Flour showed an increase of 54 per cent.
Milk showed an increase of 41 per cent.
Mutton showed an increase of 35 per cent.
Fresh pork showed an increase of 68 per cent.
Salt pork and bacon showed an increase of 80 per cent.
Ham showed an increase of 45 per cent.
Potatoes showed an increase of 20 per cent.
Veal showed an increase of 30 per cent.

This means that the people of the city of New York are paying $180,000 a day more for meat, or $66,000,000 a year, than they would pay under the prices of the previous decade.

They are paying $34,000 a day more for eggs, or $12,000,000 a year.

They are paying $20,000 a day more for milk, or $7,000,000 a year.

They are paying $34,000 a day more for butter, or $12,000,000 a year.

They are paying $7,000 a day more for potatoes, or $2,600,000 a year.

They are paying $267,000 a day more for other articles of food, or $101,000,000 a year.

Thus the people of New York are paying $542,000 more a day for food, or $200,000,000 more a year for food, under the present prices than they would pay under the average prices of 1890–1900.

My friends, let us soberly realize the great problem that confronts us with the people of one American city paying an increase of $200,000,000 on foodstuffs in a single year.

The passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill will realize a double gain for the American people. For we will put raw materials upon the free list which will save our small manufacturers a substantial part of what it now costs them to run their factories, and also let in the food products from the great harvest fields of Canada which will ameliorate the conditions in our cities, such as I have just illustrated, by reducing the cost of living.

I believe also that there is a great and important side of this question that has not as yet been considered in the debate upon this tremendously vital economic issue, and that is the opportunity that lies for moving a new and vastly important commerce of another land through the ports of the United States.

And I beg in connection with this proposed gain in American commerce that you will note how almost entirely dependent Canada is upon her eastern and western terminals for the movement of such commerce, while the United States has so many outlets necessary for this new trade.

No adequate defense can be presented for the trade barriers we have erected against the Canadian Dominion. The trade of our country with Canada should flow as freely as between the States of the Union, for we need the raw materials, the food supply, and the taking advantage of the wonderful natural resources of the Dominion.

To-day all over the land may be noted the demand of hundreds of small manufacturers that they may have the free raw materials of Canada in view of the rapidly increasing competition which they are feeling more and more each year. For the full measure of prosperity will only come to the small manufacturers when they realize an ability to secure the necessary free raw materials for their factories on the fairest and most equitable terms.

The most grievous fact that appears in the trade relations between the United States and Canada is that in the main we have taxed the people of the Dominion on the majority of goods a duty nearly twice as large as that which Canada places upon American goods.

We are establishing a system of continental freedom of trade in the passage of this measure. We are realizing for the first time, as we should have realized years ago, how important—yes, how vitally necessary to us—are the products of the Canadian forests, the earth, the sea, and the mines, and we will allow the American workingman to freely exchange his products with the Canadian lumberman, farmer, fisherman, and miner and pay for them, in reality, with products of our own, for you must bear in mind that the people of Canada are as yet little engaged in manufacturing pursuits and form an ideal people for us to trade with.

The people of Canada, by reason of our greater development in manufacturing, are to-day vitally in need of the things we are most engaged in making, and which we must sell more and more to foreign buyers if we are to continue to grow in prosperity.

With trade flowing as freely between the United States and Canada as between the States of our Union, we shall realize again that great prosperity which followed the trade centers of the East and the great agricultural centers of the West, and find history inevitably repeating itself between the manufacturing centers of the United States and the great and rapidly developing agricultural districts of the Dominion.

Never in the history of this Republic have the conditions of great affluence upon the one hand and extreme poverty upon the other been so strongly paralleled, and the only protest that now rises in the country against the passage of this measure is the voice in behalf of special interest.

The marvelous economic awakening of our people that caused the recent upheaval in politics and gave so wonderful a Democratic victory was the voice of the people crying out for relief from the exactions of a high and intolerant cost of living, and the very presence of many new faces upon the other side of this historic Chamber and a few new ones also at the extreme end of this Chamber, can be considered in no sense as the result of a personal victory, but rather the righteous demand of the people for a new order of things in the economic life of our country.

The result of the recent elections was as pleasing to those Democrats chosen to carry the message of the people as it proved displeasing and disastrous to many men who heard the voice of the people during the days of the Sixty-first Congress and heeded it not.

The tremendous increase in population in this country during the past 20 years and the gradual decrease in the purchasing power of the American dollar has been such that every thinking man realizes that a stronger and better economic policy is vitally necessary to our people.

It is a very narrow line that marks the difference between the purchasing power and the income of the American laborer, and this reciprocity measure, in giving a wider market to our exports, will aid the well-being of those who produce with their brains and hands the wealth of the land.

The American workingman should rejoice to find in the Republican ranks men of the type of McCALL, of Massachusetts, HILL, of Connecticut, CRUMPACKER, of Indiana, and others who are to-day placing loyalty to the people above all else.

When the present governor of Massachusetts voiced the needs of the people in a Republican convention he was advised by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts to leave the party, and in turning his back upon his party and becoming a Democrat and leading the people's cause he was elected by a tremendous majority last year and will be reelected by the largest majority this year ever received by a Democrat in Massachusetts.

There is no turning back from the signs of the times. [Loud applause.]

How reciprocal(?).

It has been admitted in debate by friends of this measure that the price of wheat in recent years in the United States has averaged somewhat over 10 cents per bushel more than in Canada, and that this proposed measure, if put into force, would either lower the price of American wheat or raise the price of Canadian wheat. If the former should happen, as intended in the bill, it would have produced a direct loss to the American wheat raiser of $74,000,000, applied to that crop of 1909, and a loss to the Kansas wheat grower last year of the vast sum of $8,500,000. And applying this to the middle and western portion of Kansas, where by skillful farming, the production of wheat, oats, and barley has been developed second to no other portion of our country, driving the arid boundary westward beyond the Colorado line, will work an irreparable injury and perhaps destruction to that industry there.

What loss would come to the American farmer on other products of his can not now be ascertained, but, as affecting one interest alone, again I want your attention to the words of Mr. Laurier when he said, in the aforesaid address:

> Then there is the cattle trade. Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. We have some yet, but it is not as large as it ought to be, because everybody knows that it has been constantly retarded by the exchange embargo put upon it some 20 years ago or so, and therefore, if we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise, in Great Britain, there is a ready market in the United States.

Great Britain, to whom Canada owes her allegiance, places an embargo on the cattle trade from Canada, and we are here now removing all embargoes as a gracious gift to her Canadian daughter. How generous(?). How reciprocal(?). How fair(?).

A few comparisons will be sufficient to establish the fact that this so-called reciprocal measure is not reciprocal in any respect, but wholly unilateral in spirit and effect:

(1) It gives to Canada a market of 92,000,000 of people, valued annually at $25,000,000,000, for a market of less than 9,000,000 of people, which is far less in proportion to her people than that of our own.

(2) It gives free trade in our great market for all Canadian farm products and refuses free lumber, coal, iron ore, and the like to the American farmer.

(3) It opens our markets freely, but does not require Canada to remove the export duty on her wood and wood pulp that we buy from her.

(4) As to the reciprocal nature of this agreement, the opinion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is worth considering. In the same address above referred to he compliments the Canadian minister of finance, Mr. Fielding, and the Canadian minister of customs, Mr. Patterson, who negotiated the agreement with our Secretary of State, and thanks these two men for having obtained from the United States such an advantageous arrangement and "having obtained it without the sacrifice of any Canadian interest." In other words, he means to say the United States gave all and Canada gave nothing in return.

(5) Pass this bill and we take a step backward among the nations of the earth, for Germany, France, Belgium, and the rest of the world have long since discarded the old reactionary policy of giving free trade in farm products, that even free-trade England is anxious to discard, which will bring dearth and depression to our agricultural industry; our rural population will surely decrease and the slogan "Back to the farm" will become obsolete, and "Go West, young man," will not take him to Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, or the great Middle West, but will be unheeded by him, and he will turn his back on the old home and country and either face toward Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta, to there swear allegiance to a king and live under another flag, or toward the overcrowded cities, to abide where slums and saloons abound, as breeding places of ignorance, lawlessness, crime, and anarchy. Such is not conducive to, but dangerous to the country's welfare.

It has been urged that this measure will lessen the price of food products and cheapen the cost of living to all; that it will lessen the value of food products of the producer, yes; but to the consumer, no. The consumer does not eat wheat, but the product of the Flour Trust; he does not eat fat cattle, but the products of the Beef Trust. Neither does he eat other raw materials of the producer, but the manufactured food products so completely controlled by the other trusts of our country. It is apparent, therefore, that this measure is not in the interest of the producers nor the consumers of manufactured food products, but in the interest of the conspiracy of organized avarice and greed; and the trusts, combines, and corporations will absorb, as additional profits, all reductions it will force from the producer of farm products long before it reaches the consumer of food products.

The greatest beneficiaries under this measure will undoubtedly be the trusts, combines, and corporatons who buy and sell the food products, both of the producer and consumer, together with the railroads who will transport these products from the Canadian fields to our midst in competition with our own home products. It is perfectly natural, therefore, that the Hills, Rockefellers, Morgans, Vanderbilts, and other captains of high finance are reported as favoring the passage of this measure, which is not only unreciprocal, but class legislation against a large body of our American citizens in favor of a foreign people, and is obnoxiously discriminative in character as against one class of our own people in favor of another, for it gives to the American farmer a free-trade market in which to sell his products and amply protects the trusts and combines of the country in their methods in the handling of the food products of our people. It forces the farmer to compete with free wheat and protects the Flour Trust on its flour at 50 cents per barrel. It gives free competition in barley for the farmer and 45 cents per hundred pounds protection to the brewer on malt barley; free competition in live stock for the farmer and $1.25 per hundred protection to the Beef Trust for its meats; free competition in free flaxseed and other oil seed for the farmer and ample protection on linseed oil and such products for the Oil Trust; free competition in horses and cattle for the farmer and protection at $1.25 per thousand on lumber for the Lumber Trust to house them; free competition in dairy products for the farmer and protection on coal at 45 cents per ton for the Coal Trust. Besides the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, and all the other products of the numerous other trusts seemed to be favored as against the American farmer, which is unfair, unjust, un-Republican, and un-American.

In placing myself in opposition to this measure, along with many others of like belief, I am not unmindful of the sensation that awaits our experiences beneath the most powerful machine of the times—the steam roller of the opposition—which is operated so skillfully by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. Unpleasant for a time it may be, but the conscientiousness of having stood for and defended the rights of the people we represent will be satisfaction everlasting. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the Canadian reciprocity bill one would be justified in the assumption that the paper manufacturers and lumbermen of the country would be forced into bankruptcy in the event of the passage of this measure. I am in favor of the Canadian reciprocity bill because the Lumber Trust and all its allied interests are opposing it and because it typifies the most advanced character of progressive legislation in behalf of the great masses of our people. [Applause.] The activity of the special interests in their endeavor to defeat this measure is a sign of the times.

We find the best thought of the Democratic Party of the Nation favoring this Canadian reciprocity bill, and there seems no question in my mind that its passage will eventually lower the cost of living to our people.

I do not think that God in His wisdom ever intended that an unnatural barrier should rise as a monument to greed, avarice, and the lust of wealth between the people of this country and their neighbors across the Canadian border. [Applause.]

What matters it if the earnings of the Lumber and Paper Trusts and their satellites are reduced if a market for the exportation of our products and the interchange of Canadian goods makes lighter the burden borne by the great masses of our toilers. [Applause.]

But above and beyond all else there is absolutely no question in my mind but what the present high and intolerant cost of living to our people can be lowered materially if we remove the present tariff walls existing between the United States and Canada and allow the wage earners of the land to enjoy the benefits to be derived from Canadian staple products.

To say that there can be no advantage in opening to the widest extent the great market upon our borders is the sheerest folly. Let me present for a moment as a fair and well-drawn illustration the actual conditions in the city of New York that have come about under the present high cost of living.

New York City has a population in round numbers of 4,700,000. It is estimated that these 4,700,000 persons spend about $2,350,000 a day for food. According to the tables of the United States Bureau of Labor the price of beef in 1909 showed an increase of 32 per cent over the average price for the 10 years between 1890 and 1900.

Bread showed an increase of 24 per cent.
Butter showed an increase of 35 per cent.
Eggs showed an increase of 42 per cent.
Flour showed an increase of 54 per cent.
Milk showed an increase of 41 per cent.
Mutton showed an increase of 35 per cent.
Fresh pork showed an increase of 68 per cent.
Salt pork and bacon showed an increase of 80 per cent.
Ham showed an increase of 45 per cent.
Potatoes showed an increase of 20 per cent.
Veal showed an increase of 30 per cent.

This means that the people of the city of New York are paying $180,000 a day more for meat, or $66,000,000 a year, than they would pay under the prices of the previous decade.

They are paying $34,000 a day more for eggs, or $12,000,000 a year.

They are paying $20,000 a day more for milk, or $7,000,000 a year.

They are paying $34,000 a day more for butter, or $12,000,000 a year.

They are paying $7,000 a day more for potatoes, or $2,600,000 a year.

They are paying $267,000 a day more for other articles of food, or $101,000,000 a year.

Thus the people of New York are paying $542,000 more a day for food, or $200,000,000 more a year for food, under the present prices than they would pay under the average prices of 1890–1900.

My friends, let us soberly realize the great problem that confronts us with the people of one American city paying an increase of $200,000,000 on foodstuffs in a single year.

The passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill will realize a double gain for the American people. For we will put raw materials upon the free list which will save our small manufacturers a substantial part of what it now costs them to run their factories, and also let in the food products from the great harvest fields of Canada which will ameliorate the conditions in our cities, such as I have just illustrated, by reducing the cost of living.

I believe also that there is a great and important side of this question that has not as yet been considered in the debate upon this tremendously vital economic issue, and that is the opportunity that lies for moving a new and vastly important commerce of another land through the ports of the United States.

And I beg in connection with this proposed gain in American commerce that you will note how almost entirely dependent Canada is upon her eastern and western terminals for the movement of such commerce, while the United States has so many outlets necessary for this new trade.

No adequate defense can be presented for the trade barriers we have erected against the Canadian Dominion. The trade of our country with Canada should flow as freely as between the States of the Union, for we need the raw materials, the food supply, and the taking advantage of the wonderful natural resources of the Dominion.

To-day all over the land may be noted the demand of hundreds of small manufacturers that they may have the free raw materials of Canada in view of the rapidly increasing competition which they are feeling more and more each year. For the full measure of prosperity will only come to the small manufacturers when they realize an ability to secure the necessary free raw materials for their factories on the fairest and most equitable terms.

The most grievous fact that appears in the trade relations between the United States and Canada is that in the main we have taxed the people of the Dominion on the majority of goods a duty nearly twice as large as that which Canada places upon American goods.

We are establishing a system of continental freedom of trade in the passage of this measure. We are realizing for the first time, as we should have realized years ago, how important—yes, how vitally necessary to us—are the products of the Canadian forests, the earth, the sea, and the mines, and we will allow the American workingman to freely exchange his products with the Canadian lumberman, farmer, fisherman, and miner and pay for them, in reality, with products of our own, for you must bear in mind that the people of Canada are as yet little engaged in manufacturing pursuits and form an ideal people for us to trade with.

The people of Canada, by reason of our greater development in manufacturing, are to-day vitally in need of the things we are most engaged in making, and which we must sell more and more to foreign buyers if we are to continue to grow in prosperity.

With trade flowing as freely between the United States and Canada as between the States of our Union, we shall realize again that great prosperity which followed the trade centers of the East and the great agricultural centers of the West, and find history inevitably repeating itself between the manufacturing centers of the United States and the great and rapidly developing agricultural districts of the Dominion.

Never in the history of this Republic have the conditions of great affluence upon the one hand and extreme poverty upon the other been so strongly paralleled, and the only protest that now rises in the country against the passage of this measure is the voice in behalf of special interest.

The marvelous economic awakening of our people that caused the recent upheaval in politics and gave so wonderful a Democratic victory was the voice of the people crying out for relief from the exactions of a high and intolerant cost of living, and the very presence of many new faces upon the other side of this historic Chamber and a few new ones also at the extreme end of this Chamber, can be considered in no sense as the result of a personal victory, but rather the righteous demand of the people for a new order of things in the economic life of our country.

The result of the recent elections was as pleasing to those Democrats chosen to carry the message of the people as it proved displeasing and disastrous to many men who heard the voice of the people during the days of the Sixty-first Congress and heeded it not.

The tremendous increase in population in this country during the past 20 years and the gradual decrease in the purchasing power of the American dollar has been such that every thinking man realizes that a stronger and better economic policy is vitally necessary to our people.

It is a very narrow line that marks the difference between the purchasing power and the income of the American laborer, and this reciprocity measure, in giving a wider market to our exports, will aid the well-being of those who produce with their brains and hands the wealth of the land.

The American workingman should rejoice to find in the Republican ranks men of the type of McCALL, of Massachusetts, HILL, of Connecticut, CRUMPACKER, of Indiana, and others who are to-day placing loyalty to the people above all else.

When the present governor of Massachusetts voiced the needs of the people in a Republican convention he was advised by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts to leave the party, and in turning his back upon his party and becoming a Democrat and leading the people's cause he was elected by a tremendous majority last year and will be reelected by the largest majority this year ever received by a Democrat in Massachusetts.

There is no turning back from the signs of the times. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412 and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FAISON was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of A. M. Williams, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HENRY of Texas, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

Also to Mr. DRAPER, indefinitely.

CONCLUSION OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that after three hours' debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to-morrow on the bill H. R. 4412, general debate shall close, and that one hour of that time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], one hour by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and one hour by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall run for three hours to-morrow—one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], one hour by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and the other hour by himself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 44 minutes), the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, April 21, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 21, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, fountain of wisdom, source of all good, keep us, we beseech Thee, in touch with Thee through the remaining hours of this day that we enter not into temptation, that we do wrong to no man, but with high resolves and noble purposes we may go forward with the work Thou hast given us to do. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HILL was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Kate Maliol, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Jake H. Wackert, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SWITZER was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9066) relating to claims arising under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property act, and for other purposes, and to amend and revise the same, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, a bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, in arising to close the debate in behalf of those Members upon this side of the House who believe in the policy of the present bill, I desire to say that I think the House is to be congratulated upon the illuminating discussion to which it has had an opportunity to listen. The speeches delivered upon both sides of the question and upon both sides of the aisle have been worthy of the subject—a subject which, as was said by the gentleman from Illinois yesterday, is one of the most important ever before the American Congress. The bill has important international aspects and features of an economic character that call for the careful consideration of every Member. It does not make an appeal for the use of the heroics of the hustings, but for the best thought each one of us is capable of giving it.

I listened with great interest to the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS]—the first speech that he has had an opportunity to deliver in this House, of which he has been almost the directing agency for nearly 20 years. It was a speech beautiful in structure, such a speech as is made out of a full mind, and it was entirely worthy of the subject which he discussed. I say that, although I profoundly disbelieve in the conclusions which he maintained. I regretted to notice, however, the pessimistic tone that the gentleman adopted with reference to the American farmer. But it is not strange that, having been in a position where for 20 years he could not escape from listening to the debates, he should have caught the minor key in which the praises of the farmer are usually sung upon this floor. [Applause.]

According to his eulogists here, the American farmer is a very serious-minded individual, with his wife and numerous progeny gathered about him—and I observe that these eulogists usually bless him with a bountiful offspring—desperately and with great solemnity endeavoring to cling to a precarious existence. These orators lament over his rugged qualities, they almost brood over his virtues, and as for his faults, he has none, for he is a being to whom it is impossible to sin.

Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience with the American farmer. I have seen him in his native lair. It was my great good fortune to live for a number of years in my boyhood upon one of those glorious farms in northwestern Illinois—a $200-an-acre farm, as the gentleman from Indiana called it—one of those prairie farms, not the flat farms that you have farther to the west, but where you have the billows of the prairie tumbling about you. One of those farms which, when they are under cultivation, present a scene of pastoral beauty and of fertility such as can scarcely be found anywhere in the world. I have seen farmers actually burn corn for fuel, as has been so dramatically stated in this debate. Why, it has been presented here, as if it showed the destitution of the American farmer and his straitened circumstances, that he actually burned corn for fuel. I have seen him burn corn. Sometimes he would overcrop with one grain and could not sell it profitably, but he was pretty sure to get even on some other grain; and instead of brooding over the burning of corn, more probably the farmer would sit cheerily smoking his pipe in the light of its blazing fire and his sons would rejoice that they did not have to chop wood. [Laughter and applause.]

The American farmer is not the sad-eyed monstrosity, always staring destiny in the face, that we have had painted here. The farmers, as I knew them, were a prosperous, independent, and happy race of men. I have known many farmers, and I have known some men even on Wall Street, and I have made up my mind that they both belong to the same race, and that there is about as much human nature in the one class as in the other. I have sometimes thought that if the numbers were reversed and that if we had 5,000,000 voters on Wall Street and only a few hundred farmers, our statesmen would sing the homely virtues of J. P. Morgan and his crew and would bestow upon them some of these lugubrious eulogiums of which the American farmer has been so long the patient victim. [Applause and laughter.] And their worst enemy could hardly wish them a harder fate.

Now, it is argued against this bill—and I do not propose to weary the House with a repetition of the statistics we have heard—that just as the opening up of the Western States depressed agriculture in New England so the opening up of our markets to Canadian produce will have the same effect upon the agriculture of the country, and especially upon the agriculture of the West. There is no similarity whatever between the two cases. From 1870 to 1890, you will remember, we built railroads simply for the sake of building railroads. We threw, sometimes in a single year, many thousands of miles of railroad across the most fertile land on the face of the globe, land that was uninhabited. Railroads went in advance of civilization, and in order to get business they sent their agents all over Europe stimulating immigration; and it so happened that the financial and commercial depression from 1873 to 1878 threw hundreds of thousands of men out of employment in the East, and they found places upon the western farms. We had brought under cultivation, and their produce thrown upon our markets almost, as it were, in a day, great and fertile States of this Union, and in order to permit the farmers to live the railroads gave them unnaturally low rates to the markets of the country and to those abroad.

It was said by Prof. Meyer that a bushel of wheat could be carried more cheaply from Chicago to Liverpool than from Budapest to Prague, a distance in a straight line of only 175 miles. A man in Illinois could get into the markets of Boston more cheaply than a man who lived in Worcester County in Massachusetts. The result of this abnormally low rate was practically to transport the prairies of the West into the suburbs of New York and Boston. And, of course, agriculture was depressed in New England, not merely from that circumstance, but because of the conditions there which were adverse to agriculture as it was then conducted.

I saw agriculture not only in the West, but when I was a young boy my father sent me to New England to school, and I had an opportunity there to see how they farmed in New England. In the West a farmer could turn a furrow for a mile, if his farm went that far, without taking his hand from the plow; but in New England the farmer would urge his horses, and more often his oxen, for a few feet and then would have to turn out for a stump or stone. [Laughter.] He would try to select smooth little patches upon the hillside. While a New England hillside, with its alternation of little rye fields and cornfields and pasture and meadow and woodland, presents a very beautiful mosaic to the eye, it certainly is not favorable to agriculture. [Laughter.] And it was inevitable that under the adverse natural conditions and with the antiquated methods which the New England farmers employed they could not compete with the rich and fertile prairie lands of the West.

Now, how is it with Canada? Why, there is, as I have said, no parallel between the two cases. Champlain laid the foundations of Port Royal and Quebec before the Pilgrims landed upon Plymouth Rock. That country is as old as this country.

For 150 years it has been a part of the wealthiest empire in the world, and yet to-day it has less than 8,000,000 people, and instead of capitalists putting in their money, thrusting railroads across the cold fields of Canada, Canada has been compelled largely to build her railroads out of her own treasury, and although she has given enormous land grants and vast sums of money she to-day has only about 25,000 miles of railroads in the whole Dominion.

Canada has not the slightest advantage over the West in fertility or in aptitude for agriculture. The advantage is all the other way. The part of Canada gentlemen fear is a country of a single crop. A single crop will sack the soil. The farms in the Canadian northwest are scarcely habitable for a good many months in the year. Agriculture in our West can be carried on under far better conditions than there.

The lands there are not so cheap as they were in the West when it was settled. Rich prairie land sold in the United States for $5 and less an acre. I happen to know a case where a very intelligent business man of New England desired to buy a half section of unbroken land for each of his two sons. He bought it nearly two years ago, selecting it with great judgment and care, and he was compelled to pay the Canadian Pacific Railroad Co. $25 an acre, and another young man bought some land two weeks afterwards and it had risen to $30 an acre; and that prairie land has since been going up in price. These young gentlemen who started out to build their fortunes found that they had to pay a very high price for their horses, had to hire a man to look after their farms in the winter, began with a drought and a poor crop, and at the present time they still have their fortunes to acquire.

But suppose our young men do go to Canada, and many of them have already gone there. Why, the State of Iowa, that wonderful agricultural State, during the last decade lost in population. Does that mean that it declined in prosperity? Not at all. It is one of the greatest, and is destined to continue to be one of the greatest, and richest agricultural regions in the world. But young men have gone from Iowa because they could get more land in Canada than at home. The land of their own State was all taken up. Suppose they shall found upon the eastern slopes of the Canadian Rockies a newer and a fairer Iowa? Who is there who will not wish them Godspeed? [Applause.] They go there to win their fortunes, just as their fathers made their fortunes, by selling in the open markets of the world; and if they deserve to prosper and if the country is so favorable to agriculture, they will repeat the prosperity of their fathers.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], in the course of his speech, alluded to the agricultural conditions in Germany, and to the fact that Bismarck established agricultural duties there. I fancy that Bismarck did not establish agricultural duties so much for the sake of agriculture as to placate the powerful agrarian element and establish generally in Germany the policy of protection. But they have had, ever since the time of Bismarck, high protection upon agricultural products in Germany.

Let us see what the effect has been. There is this singular law, pointed out by Prof. Fawcett, of Cambridge University, England, that while in a great many articles of common use the demand does not increase the price, yet in the case of agricultural products the demand does increase the price, and he reached that conclusion upon a line of argument something like this:

A man may be producing manufactures of cotton or flax or some other article in which labor is the chief element of production, and if there is a demand for twice as many goods of the kind he makes, he doubles the size of his factory and can manufacture even more cheaply than he could before. But in a country like Germany, which normally supports its population, when you come to increase that population under the stimulus of protection, by building up great manufacturing cities and making a strain upon the resources of the soil, there is a greater demand for agricultural produce than the farmer normally has raised. Now, there are in every country some lands that ordinarily are not cultivated because prices do not make it profitable to cultivate them. They are called valueless, but when you raise the price of farm products it pays to till the best of these lands, and the higher the price the poorer the land it will pay to cultivate. There is an "oscillating margin," upon which you may or may not be able profitably to raise farm produce, according as farm produce is high or low. The man who cultivates must get prices that will warrant him in doing so. These prices enable the man who has fertile land to make still more money, and the increased demand for agricultural produce drives people into the cultivation of lands previously unprofitable, and in order to induce them to do it they must of necessity be paid a higher price for their produce.

Now, let us see what has happened in Germany, which relatively to us has a very large population per square mile and which, with a growing population, has had high protection in agriculture for a great many years. The growing demand for foodstuffs has greatly increased prices. I noticed the other day an address made by the chancellor of the German Empire, who is a rigid and uncompromising protectionist. At a meeting of the National Society of Agriculture he said:

> I am especially grateful to the president—
> That is, the president of that society—
> for his frank admission that the prices of many farm products have in the past year reached an unhealthy height, burdening in a deplorable manner a great number of people.

That comes from the chancellor of the German Empire with reference to this artificial increase in the price of food. He declares that it burdens in a deplorable manner a great number of people.

Let us look further at the situation in Germany. The agrarian element there, who own the land, are a very powerful element. They not only enjoy high and unnatural prices for the common articles of food, but they have great power in directing the German Empire. As you all know, the State owns the railroads. At a certain time of the year the sugar-bearing lands along the Elbe make special demands for agricultural labor, and so it used to be the custom at that time of the year for laborers living along the Oder to go and help in the harvest of these sugar-bearing lands, where they would get better wages, and then when the harvesting was over to come back again. The German railroads gave them excursion rates. Those agrarians who lived along the Oder made a complaint to the German Government in effect that they had a natural right to employ the labor of their locality, and that for the Government to give these laborers excursion rates made it necessary for the agrarians to pay higher wages to their men; and although the minister of finance admitted that it was a good thing for the German laborer, although it gave him more money temporarily, although it enabled an untraveled class to get away from home and to see another part of the Empire and have their outlook broadened, yet the Government yielded to the demand of the agrarian element and refused longer to sell the excursion tickets.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] alluded to the law called the Gregory King law, by which he showed that as the supply of an article of common use increased at an arithmetical ratio, the price decreased at practically a geometrical ratio.

That is, you increase the surplus of a necessary article and you depress the price out of all proportion to the amount by which you increase the surplus. It readily occurred to me that there is a reverse to that law, and the other side is illustrated in the case of Germany. If you decrease below the natural demand the supply of an article of common use in an arithmetical ratio, you increase the price of that article in practically a geometrical ratio. [Applause.] I think there is no escape from that conclusion.

Then about the static equilibrium of which he spoke, in nations between agriculture and manufactures. It is a very good thing if you can secure the equilibrium naturally, but it is a very bad thing to pay too much for it. Suppose there is a nation that has coal mines, iron mines, water powers, great facilities for manufacturing, and a poor soil. Is it wise for her to take her people from the operation of the great natural resources and facilities for manufacturing with which she has been blessed and put them to the cultivation of an infertile soil? Is it not better for them to work the mines, to build up manufactures, and exchange their products with some other nation that does not have these resources but has a fertile soil?

Carry it out to extremes on this theory and every household should maintain an equilibrium, and each should have its own blacksmith, its own shoemaker, and its own spinner. The law of modern trade is for men and nations to do the things they are best fitted to do and to exchange products with each other. [Applause.]

I paid close attention to the argument of the gentleman from Maine, because I have a high respect for him and because I was greatly attracted by his speech. There is one other thing to which I wish to call attention. He referred to the British tariff commission, and quoted them as in favor, practically, of reenacting the corn laws. That would strike an ordinary man as an admission almost from the Cobden Club itself in favor of the policy which the gentleman from Maine was advocating. I thought from its name, as very likely the gentleman from Maine thought, that it must be a royal commission, or if not a royal commission it must be a sort of Government commission. I have looked it up, and in Hazell's Annual, which tells you briefly everything about the Empire, you will find the British Tariff Commission tabulated with other similar organizations. On the one side it frankly states the organizations against Mr. Chamberlain's proposal, which was to tax food coming into England, and there we have the Free Trade League and the Cobden Club and others. In the other column they have catalogued the organizations for Mr. Chamberlain's proposal, and among them is the tariff commission, established by Joseph Chamberlain in the beginning of 1904 in order to push along his particular ideas. That is practically the protective-tariff league of the British Empire, and if you read the names you will find there a collection of gentlemen, some of them very comfortable manufacturers, who are deeply concerned, as are the manufacturers in this country, for the poor farmer. [Laughter and applause.]

I could construct a tariff commission like that here, and it would be a commission of more eminent ability. I would put the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my distinguished, and I may say my illustrious, friend at the head; I would put the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] upon it; I would give a place upon it to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]; and then I would add to it the secretary of the American Protective Tariff League and of the Home Market Club of Massachusetts. And we should have a fine collection of gentlemen, of great ability and great knowledge; but if I wanted to hold forth anything they said in favor of protection as an admission of an ancient enemy to protection I think some of our narrow-minded partisans on the other side would reserve the right to object. [Laughter and applause.]

This whole discussion has revolved about the price of wheat. But first I wish to say a word about the price of land. I do not think the effect of this legislation is going to be to decrease the price of land, but to keep it from going up too rapidly in value. So far as competition with Canada is concerned, if North Dakota, which has a longer summer and a shorter winter than Canada, can be a part of the same agricultural domain and can compete with Kansas and Iowa and Oklahoma and those wonderfully rich lands toward the South, lands as fertile as those in Campania, where, as Virgil said—

> Summer borrows months beyond her own;
> Twice the teeming flocks are fruitful,
> Twice the laden orchards groan—

if North Dakota can compete with lands like those, what has she to fear from the more frosty Alberta? What has Minnesota to fear from Manitoba when she can prosper side by side with Iowa and Nebraska?

The debate has been chiefly about the farmer, and I have wondered whether he was really so much agitated over this bill as we have been led to believe. I have wondered, since in 1865 patriotism was the pretext which certain great interests employed to terminate the Elgin treaty, whether after all there was not something masked behind the farmer here. People have been industriously sending telegrams to Members. Evidently there has been a great campaign of education, and the suspicion that the farmer was being put where he did not deserve to be has reminded me of that old fort near Panama which was captured from the Spaniards by Morgan and his buccaneers, and it is said the way they captured it was to drive in advance of their charging columns the nuns and the sisters of charity. The Spaniards did not wish to fire upon these good women and so the buccaneers captured the fortress. [Applause and laughter.] I do not wish to say that there have been any other gentlemen behind the American farmer, but I have had just a suspicion that there were some interests behind him pushing him to the front to take the brunt of the fire or to silence it.

But this whole question revolves about wheat, and it seems to me that we can decide it upon wheat alone. I think there is no doubt that in any country which exports a considerable surplus of wheat the price is fixed in the market that takes the surplus. We have been for many years one of the great granaries of the world, selling in the open market, and our wheat has sold on a parity and is selling to-day on a parity, freights being adjusted, with the wheat of Argentina, of Australia, of Canada, of India, and Russia. Although it would seem hardly necessary to quote an authority upon so clear a proposition, I have here Prof. Dondlinger's interesting book on wheat. He has evidently written with great sympathy for the farmer, and he lays down this proposition:

> As soon as a country has a surplus for export and receives more for exported wheat than the home price, plus the exporting, the export will increase, the home price will rise, production will increase, and the price is no longer fixed within the country. The country which buys the export may thus fix the price of wheat for the country which produces it. * * * It is as a consumer of the world surplus that England has held a position of such commanding importance in fixing the price of wheat.

Gentlemen present here some discrepancies in the price of wheat upon one side of the line and the other. I can find similar discrepancies between neighboring towns in South Dakota. It depends upon elevator facilities, it depends upon competition in buying, and you can find those differences in towns in the same State. They are simply little backward whirls and eddies, that you will find in the most rapid onrushing stream. They are simply the exceptions that prove the rule.

The man in North Dakota does not compete with the man across the line in Manitoba directly, but he competes with him 4,000 miles away in the Liverpool market. We have an exportable surplus of something like 100,000,000 bushels a year, and Canada has an exportable surplus of, perhaps, half that amount, and those surpluses are both taken by the Liverpool market. It makes no difference whether the wheat is swept from Canadian or American thrashing floors, when it goes to Liverpool, according to its quality, one kind brings the same price as the other. And so we witness this spectacle on account of the high tariff wall; we see these two broad, golden rivers of wheat flowing in parallel lines upon either side of the boundary and seeking the level of a common market. It seems to me quite beyond our capacity to understand that any other law can operate where we export such an enormous volume of this necessary article, not controlled by a trust, than that the price is fixed in the country which takes the surplus.

Let us take the reverse of that, and we have an illustration to prove the truth of this rule. Take sugar. We do not produce as much sugar as we consume. We consume some 3,500,000 tons every year, and we need to import a great deal from the outside world. Some years ago we had before this House a proposition to give a preferential duty of 20 per cent to Cuban sugar over other sugars. It was alleged here that the Cubans, for whom we designed this arrangement, would get no benefit at all, but that it would go to the Sugar Trust, and what do we see? We see precisely the result that the advocates of that reciprocity bill pointed out at that time.

The sugar market of the world is Hamburg. The price of sugar in New York is the Hamburg price plus the freight across the ocean plus the full duty into New York. And the Cuban planters, providing they show reasonable intelligence and do not glut the market at a given time, can reckon on the Hamburg price with the freight and full duty added. Since we have to make up our deficiency in the production of sugar by large importations, our home price is the world's—or Hamburg—price with the duty added, and there is a parity in price between Hamburg and Cuba and Sumatra when the differences in duties and freights are considered.

I read this morning in the New York Sun an article upon sugar written, I believe, by Mr. Robinson, one of the most accomplished economic writers upon the American press. He took importations from Sumatra and from some other countries and he carried out the prices into thousandths, and then an importation from Cuba, which had a preferential duty. When they were finally landed in New York they all appeared at precisely the same price, each paying its freight and particular duty. That price is adjusted, although I am not quoting him as an authority upon that, with reference to the Hamburg price.

What is going to happen to wheat if this bill passes? Gentlemen say, if the effect is not to decrease the price of bread, why do we want to pass the bill, and if it is going to decrease the price of bread, it will injure the American farmer, and they repeat this very ancient tariff riddle. I will tell you what I think will happen. We are going to reach just the same condition in regard to wheat as we are in to-day in regard to sugar. When we cease to raise as much as we consume, and when we shall have to bring wheat in from other nations for our own consumption, then we shall see the law I have been talking about illustrated from the reverse side.

Instead of our exporting at the world's price to Liverpool, paying our freight, we shall buy at the world's price at Liverpool and pay in addition the freight and the cost of overcoming any other obstacles in order to get into our own market; and when you reach that point the tariff for the first time—this tariff that has looked so magnificent upon the statute books to the American farmer—will become operative to increase the price of wheat above the world's price. Now, is there any American farmer who would desire to add to the price he is getting in Liverpool 25 cents a bushel of tariff plus the freight rate from Liverpool? He has prospered on wheat growing on the basis of prices in the markets of the world. Do you imagine that when the time of our scarcity comes and when we are not raising as much as we consume that the American farmer will desire to have this price artificially raised in order that he may make more money? He certainly will make as much then if the tariff is not on as he does now.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. McCALL. Just a brief one. I am afraid I shall not have time to conclude.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is precisely upon this point. All I desire to know is the gentleman's conclusion from his argument. The gentleman argues the price of wheat is fixed at Liverpool, and supposing it will continue to be fixed at Liverpool I desire to know whether in the view of the gentleman the price of wheat in this country will be affected by this Canadian reciprocity agreement?

Mr. McCALL. When I say the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool, of course that is only popularly correct. The price of wheat is fixed compared with the world's demand and the world's supply.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota rose.

Mr. McCALL. Now, just wait a minute. If the effect of this treaty or bill is to increase the world's supply of wheat, then to that extent you will keep down the world's price of wheat; but inasmuch as Canada has access to the same market it has now, it is not probable that the effect of this bill will be to increase her production of wheat. Consequently the passage of the bill will have no effect upon the world's price of wheat.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will it have any effect upon the price of wheat in the United States? I desire to have the gentleman's opinion on that.

Mr. McCALL. Now, I think I reasoned that point out. The gentleman may not have done me the honor of paying attention——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have paid very close attention.

Mr. McCALL. I think I have suggested that this will become operative and keep the price down at the time when we have to import a surplus, and then it will be more convenient for us to buy from Canada; and—I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is a very important subject, and I want the gentleman's views upon it.

Mr. McCALL. I know it is a very interesting subject, with many ramifications, but I can hardly be turned from the main course of my argument in the time which I have.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman decline to yield on that point for a question?

Mr. McCALL. The gentleman wants me to appear ungracious by declining to yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No.

Mr. McCALL. I think I answered the gentleman's question. For that reason I would prefer not to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think that if ever in the fullness of time we do not produce wheat in the United States sufficient for our own consumption, the future Congresses, 40, 50, or 100 years from now, will not be competent to deal with this question? [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman is here at that time [loud applause and laughter], and the universal hope is manifested in the universal applause [applause], and it appears that the farmer is getting 25 cents a bushel out of this duty on his wheat, and the proposition is made upon this floor to strike off that duty, and therefore to reduce the farmer's price, the gentleman from Illinois will seize the pillars of the temple of protection and will threaten to pull them all down if we touch the farmer's duty upon wheat. [Applause.]

A great deal has been said about the Elgin treaty. It has been argued that it was unfavorable to the United States. Let me call your attention to this circumstance, that in 1850 the trade going both ways between Canada and the United States only amounted to about $5,000,000 a year. This treaty was put in force in 1855 and remained in force for 11 years, and yet in that time it covered nearly a half billion of trade between the two countries. Why, it practically created trade between Canada and the United States, and Canada for a generation after we abrogated that treaty stood in our antechambers asking that we make another reciprocity arrangement with her. She continued to do so for 30 years, until at last Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "No more pilgrimages to Washington."

Sir John Macdonald made it the fundamental policy of his party to have reciprocity with the United States and, at the same time, incidental protection. And when he came into power, about 1880, for, I think, the second or third time, he established the policy of protection for Canada and attempted to secure a reciprocity treaty. That policy of protection had the effect of stimulating Canadian manufacture, and in 1893 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the present prime minister, said that "If you give us Liberals power we will destroy protection, which is a sham and a delusion and a robbery," showing that there was complete reciprocity in political rhetoric and that he had gotten that "free of all duty" from the Democratic Party in the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir Wilfrid Laurier three years afterward was intrusted with power. He is a sound and sagacious statesman, and I wish to call the attention of my enthusiastic friends upon the other side of the aisle to the fact that he has done nothing whatever to reduce protective duties in Canada except simply to create the British preferential. And I trust that his sound sense and moderation will be imitated by gentlemen upon the other side if they ever have the responsibility of dealing with the tremendous industries of the United States.

I think it is not necessary to say anything upon the most-favored-nation aspect of this treaty. We heard a great deal about it when the question was discussed in the last Congress, and the fact that that objection has not been urged by gentlemen in the present debate is pretty conclusive evidence that there was no foundation whatever for their former contention. I think, also, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND] has finally disposed of the argument, or, rather, the objection, that we should not have reciprocity in competitive articles.

I am rather surprised to find gentlemen representing border States of the Union opposed to this treaty. A high-tariff wall, however beneficial it may be to a country as a whole, throws a very deep shadow. People can only trade upon one side of the wall. They are shut out from their neighbors upon the other side. If the men in North Dakota would look at this a little more broadly, they would see that it would be far better for their State, for the farmers there, to trade across the line and acquire farms across the line and not be upon the outer rim of the country where the circulation of the trade current is feeble, as is that of the blood in the extremities of the body. I would suggest that they should not want to continue to be the extremities of the body politic, but that they might more profitably wish to annex Canada industrially, so that they might trade and extend their farms to the north as well as to the south.

Now, it has been denied that the policy of reciprocity, such as this bill presents, is a Republican policy. We have had it shown in this debate that the administration of President Grant, who was a pretty good Republican and did not come from New England, negotiated a reciprocity treaty upon the lines of the Elgin treaty. We have seen that Garfield, afterwards President, was in favor of the Elgin treaty. We had it asserted upon the authority of Mr. Curtis that Mr. McKinley was in favor of the policy. Certainly the amendment proposed by Mr. Blaine tended strongly to show that he was in favor of the policy.

And now I want to quote from a very distinguished man, a man who was governor of a leading State and who has since succeeded a great statesman as the political leader of his State. I refer to ALBERT B. CUMMINS, who was at the time governor of Iowa. I am going to quote from a speech of Gov. CUMMINS, made to the Boston Merchants' Association on December 10, 1903. I will not read all of the extract, because it is somewhat long, but I will read what he says in conclusion:

> Suppose we could to-night add Canada, from ocean to ocean and from her southern line to the North Pole, to the territory of the United States, so that when some courageous American explorer plants the banner of the Republic upon the axis of the world and its beautiful folds fill with the air of the North it will proclaim the eternal sovereignty of the United States. * * * How many are there here or elsewhere who would look upon this accession of power and population upon land and lake and sea as a misfortune to our country or a blow inflicted upon her prosperity?
> I go further and eliminate national pride. How many banks would fail on that account? How many factories would close because the Stars and Stripes were flying over this vast domain? What acre would be worth less? What man would be without work or receive less compensation? * * *
>
> Mark you, I am not dreaming of annexation, nor am I advocating free trade with Canada, for the former is more remote than ever before, and the latter is wholly impracticable. I have used the figure only to show that we can safely draw nearer to our neighbor and safely enter upon the negotiation of a reciprocal treaty.

[Applause.]

I commend that to the attention of some of our agricultural friends from the West. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it appears from some of the arguments made in this House, and from some of the arguments that are advanced in Canada, that this bill is to be mutually destructive to the agriculture of both countries, and that the deplorable condition of the American farmer under it is only to be equaled by the wretched squalor which the Canadian farmer will have to face. [Laughter.] As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] so eloquently said yesterday, this bill presents a great ethical question. It presents an enlightened policy. The President of the United States is simply asking this country to obey the laws of nature, which no great nation can violate with impunity.

Here these two countries lie side by side for over 3,700 miles. The lines of trade naturally run north and south, and we are attempting to force them to run east and west.

And it is the policy of justice. Remember that during the last dozen years our balance of trade against Canada has been nearly $1,000,000,000. She is buying of us this very year more than $250,000,000 in value, and 70 per cent of that trade goes there absolutely free of duty. Her average duty against the goods that we send her is only half as much as the average duty that we impose against her; and of this you may be certain, that after this bill shall pass the average duty of the United States against Canada will still be higher than the average of the duties levied by Canada against the United States.

The President is recognizing the laws of nature. The fact that that country buys from us nearly twice as much as she does from all the other nations of the world shows most powerfully how the ties of nature are drawing us commercially together. It is not wise to try to float upstream. We should permit the laws of nature to work without obstruction, and they will work, for the benefit of both countries. The size of our planet is dwindling every year. The discovery of all of the lands of the world, the wonderful inventions of the last century, the railroad and the telephone and the telegraph make this world to-day as small, compared with the world of the time of Columbus, as one of Jupiter's satellites is as compared with Jupiter. We are rapidly growing smaller, and here is this great neighbor of ours that is industrially a part of the United States. I say it is wise for us to recognize that fact and to pass this bill. It does not go far enough, but it takes a long step in the right direction.

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

Mr. MCCALL. I have about three minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. MCCALL. It is simply a matter of saying a few things in three minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to ask the gentleman one question. He spoke during the course of his remarks on the question of the most-favored-nation clause. He said that nothing in this bill as it stands would violate the most-favored-nation clause. Suppose, however, an amendment were offered changing a duty in this bill; as, for instance, suppose that an amendment were offered putting Canadian meat on the free list without any reduction on the part of Canada. In his opinion would that violate the most-favored-nation clause?

Mr. MCCALL. I think that would violate the most-favored-nation clause.

I regret that I have only three minutes more. It is argued in effect by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] in his very able speech:

> Add this farmers' free list to this bill. Load it to the gunwales with amendments and sink it if you can.

Consider for a moment the sort of a measure this bill would become. Here is a proposition to carry out an international agreement. The first section of the act says that flour shall be admitted at a certain rate of duty from Canada when Canada shall admit flour at the same rate coming from this country, and the same thing with regard to meat and other articles.

The trade is carefully carried out in the first article. Then, in the fourth article, with contemptuous levity we say that all these things, coming from all the rest of the world, for which Canadian statesmen have paid a consideration to get a reduction of duty upon them, shall come into our markets free of duty. Webster said, "Politics should cease at the water's edge"; but this would be playing politics upon an international scale. It would treat with levity the negotiations between the Canadian commissioners and the President of the United States. It would attest, at the same time, their inability to make a bargain and the ability of the President of the United States to drive a hard bargain, because, without any consideration whatever, in a subsequent section, we freely give better terms to the rest of the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have just two or three minutes more, the boundary line between these two countries stretches, as I have said, for 3,700 miles. There is no modern fort along that line. After the war of 1812, by the Rush-Bagehot treaty, we agreed to have no further armaments upon the Great Lakes, although two of the chief battles of that war had been fought upon them. Great cities, with billions of dollars of property, with fabulous wealth, have grown up along that boundary. They are not defended by a single gun, but there are no cities in all the world that are more safe, because they are fortified and guarded by the good sense, the common interests, and the friendly sentiments of two great nations. [Applause.] We have forts, it is true, and guns along that line, but they are antiquated and the survivals of a time long past. And we have made the dreams of the poets come true, for the boys wage mimic wars in the crumbling embrasures of the forts, the birds build their nests in the lips of the cannon, and little children play upon them and clasp their silent throats. We can just as safely dismantle the tariff forts between the two countries. Canada is one with us in sentiment. She is one with us in all the strongest ties that can draw nations together; and I trust that this side of the House will vie with that side of the House and support the President of the United States in the enlightened and civilized policy proposed by this bill. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. MCCALL] in believing that the question now under discussion in this House is one of vast importance. I quite agree with him also that the debate has been of a high order, quite up to the best traditions of the House of Representatives.

During the last Congress I took occasion to make some observations upon the pending measure, and I shall endeavor so far as I can to avoid any repetition now.

With such knowledge as I was able to gain at that time, of its purposes and probable effects, I felt it my duty to oppose it.

Investigation and reflection have strengthened me in the conviction that the best interests of our people call, and call loudly, for its defeat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I shall not waste time by way of preliminaries. I ask, in the first place, what necessity was there for the making of this agreement at this time?

Our trade relations with Canada had been adjusted under a tariff law only recently passed. The President had announced that they had been satisfactorily adjusted. The table of exports and imports between the two countries showed that existing conditons were most favorable to our people. Our trade was large and increasing and the balance was in our favor to the extent of many millions annually. It is shown by the schedules accompanying the President's message that under this agreement we will surrender two and one-half millions of revenue yearly in excess of the amount surrendered by Canada. If any necessity therefore existed for new trade conditions, it was on the part of Canada and not of the United States. So far, then, the agreement is undeniably to our disadvantage.

Who suggested the making of such an agreement? We had only recently enacted a new tariff law. Business was gradually adjusting itself to new conditions. True, there was dissatisfaction with the new law, as there always is with a new tariff law. The public press wanted to have free paper, but contained no suggestion of free trade for our farm products. The President and others found fault with the wool schedule, but even so, the President declared the law the best tariff law ever placed on the statute book. He did not intimate any desire for free trade for our agriculture.

What political party outside of Massachusetts suggested reciprocity with Canada? What political convention, in what State of the Union, proposed the opening up anew of our tariff law so as to institute free trade in any form between the United States and Canada?

What national convention suggested it? Where in the platform of the Republican Party upon which the President made his appeal to the people and secured his election do you find, directly or indirectly, that reciprocity with Canada is a party policy?

It would appear, then, that in the absence of any discovered necessity and without any popular demand for it this agreement was made by the President and made in secret, for it is not contended that any party leader was consulted with respect to it.

I approach now a question which is of fundamental importance as bearing upon the constitutional relation of the executive and legislative departments of the Government. I do not need to enlarge on the necessity of compelling each of our coordinate departments to confine itself within its own sphere. Any invasion by one department of the rights and functions of another disarranges the whole scheme and operates to deprive one of the powers granted and to clothe another with powers denied. Too much, I fear, in recent years has there been a concentration of power in the executive department.

Whence comes the constitutional power of the President, let me ask, to make an agreement with a foreign nation which shall revise our revenue laws?

And whence comes the power of the House of Representatives to approve such an agreement, in bulk, without exercising its right of judgment and of amendment, unless it renounces its constitutional prerogative to inaugurate revenue measures?

What is the Canadian pact, as the public press has termed it? The President said in his message recently sent to Congress:

> In my annual message of December 6, 1910, * * * I also informed you that, by my direction, the Secretary of State had dispatched two representatives of the Department of State as special commissioners to Ottawa to confer with representatives of the Dominion Government, that they were authorized to take steps to formulate a reciprocal trade agreement, and that the Ottawa conferences thus begun had been adjourned to be resumed in Washington.
> On the 7th of the present month two cabinet ministers came to Washington as representatives of the Dominion Government, and the conferences were continued between them and the Secretary of State. The result of the negotiations was that on the 21st instant a reciprocal trade agreement was reached, the text of which is herewith transmitted, with accompanying correspondence and other data. * * *
> My purpose in making a reciprocal trade agreement with Canada has been not only to obtain one that would be mutually advantageous to both countries, but one which also would be truly national in its scope. * * *
> I feel I have correctly interpreted the wish of the American people by expressing in the arrangement now submitted to Congress for its approval their desire for a more intimate and cordial relationship with Canada. I therefore earnestly hope that the measure will be promptly enacted into law.

That which is now before us is called in the message "a reciprocal trade agreement," on "arrangement," and a "measure." It is said to have been made by authority of the President, and it is submitted to Congress for what? To be debated, deliberated upon, to be amended, to be finally passed upon in such form as Congress may determine? Not at all—to be approved and enacted into law.

It is safe to say that the President has no constitutional power to make an "agreement" or "arrangement" with a foreign power to revise our revenue law, especially in terms which preclude the exercise of any judgment upon the part of Congress or either branch thereof.

The President made a carefully prepared speech at Springfield, from which it is apparent that he assumed he had such power.

He said:

> The Constitution provides that the President may make treaties—
> The President may make treaties—
> by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the treaties when thus made shall constitute the law of the land. It has always been a question, however, whether it was not necessary, in order to carry treaties affecting tariff and revenue measures into effect, to have action by Congress in the form of legislation recognizing and enforcing the treaty.

Mr. Chairman, that is the law. No treaty can be made relating to our revenues that will be effective until it subsequently be indorsed by the Congress of the United States. At the time when the Cuban treaty was indorsed Congress said:

> And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be treated or construed as an admission on the part of the House of Representatives that customs duties can be changed otherwise than by an act of Congress originating in said House.

To continue now the President's speech:

> Because of this doubt it was thought wiser on behalf of both Governments not to make a formal treaty.

I do not find in the Constitution of the United States any distinction between a "treaty" and a "formal treaty."

> Not to make a formal treaty, but to make an agreement between the Executives by which each, exercising his constitutional power in his Government, should submit the agreement in the form of a statute to be enacted and go into force on condition that a similar statute was passed by the legislature of the other country.

It is apparent from what the President here says that he assents to the proposition that a treaty relating to tariff changes must receive the indorsement of the House of Representatives before it can go into effect, and it is apparent also that he claims to have a power as Executive, beyond the treaty-making power, to make an agreement with a foreign executive changing our tariff laws in terms which shall not be subject to legislative review or amendment.

It does not require any argument to demonstrate that the President has no such constitutional power.

In both the McKinley law and the Dingley law certain powers were conferred on the President to make tariff changes, but the terms were prescribed by Congress, otherwise the changes would have been held unconstitutional as being a delegation of legislative power that Congress could not make.

There are no provisions in existing law similar to those which were in the McKinley and Dingley laws.

In a subsequent part of his speech the President used these terms:

> In other words, the great benefit of this treaty is the profit in mutual exchange, etc.

Further on he says:

> My own view is that no step could be taken more in the interest of a reasonable policy of protection than the approval of this treaty.

The President's view of his own powers was shared by the Canadian representatives. In their written stipulation accompanying the agreement they provide:

> 3. It is agreed that the desired tariff changes shall not take the formal shape of a treaty, but that the Governments of the two countries will use their utmost endeavors to bring about such changes by concurrent legislation at Washington and Ottawa.
> 4. The Government of the countries having made this agreement—

And so forth.

From the foregoing it is apparent that both the President and the Canadian representatives entered into what they both recognized as an informal treaty, but what they called an agreement. Whether the Canadian representatives had power to make either a trade agreement or a treaty I do not undertake to say, but I do assert with the utmost confidence that the President had no power to make any agreement changing our revenue laws except such as is conferred on him by the treaty-making clause of the Constitution. And any agreement so made, to be effective, must receive, first, the approval of two-thirds of the Senate and, second, the indorsement of the Congress.

Should the pending bill be passed by a majority of the votes of both Houses, you will have as the result only the unauthorized legislative indorsement of an unauthorized Executive act, and I apprehend that the constitutional powers of the House and the constitutional power of the Executive are not beyond the power of judicial definition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But you say this is "a bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes." But that is not true. It is a bill to validate a reciprocal trade agreement made by the President with certain Canadian officials so as to make changes in our revenue law. But the Constitution provides "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." To say that this bill originated in the House of Representatives is merely to juggle with words. The bill, even in form, originated in the Executive department. The form, however, amounts to nothing. It is the President's agreement that you are called upon to ratify. That is the substance; that originated with the Executive.

The power to originate revenue measures comprises the power (1) to choose the subjects of taxation and (2) to name the rate of tax. In this measure, whereby you are asked—to use the language of the President—to put "the agreement in the form of a statute," the President and the Canadian commissioners have selected the objects of taxation and also the rates of tax, and you can not dot an "i" or cross a "t." So bound and helpless is the House of Representatives in dealing with this measure that in the last Congress it was jammed through the House under a drastic rule, which not only prohibited amendment but prevented its being read. Now, in this Congress, open proclamation is made by the majority that no amendment will be permitted, because such amendment would jeopardize the agreement.

In all its history the House of Representatives never before knew so humiliating a day as this, called upon, as it is, to renounce its constitutional prerogative and register an Executive decree.

It remains to be seen whether the Senate will renounce its constitutional prerogative as sharer in the treaty-making power.

Of course it is the sheerest sophistry to contend that the adoption by Congress of the President's agreement is equivalent in law to its inception in Congress. To adopt is not to originate.

But suppose that both House and Senate renounce their constitutional functions, pass this measure by majority votes, and that it be signed by the President. What then? Ostensibly it becomes a law. The correction of the Members of the House and Senate who have failed in their duty belongs to their constituents. The law, however, will still require the approval of a competent tribunal before it can be effective.

I have challenged an answer to the question, What necessity existed for the making of this agreement at this time? And to the other question, What popular demand was there for it? I proceed further to ask, What do its advocates urge in its behalf? Very little; very little. They have spent all of their time in trying to demonstrate that it will do us no harm. They have been and are strictly on the defensive.

Men on the other side of the Chamber have been loud in its praises as a Democratic free-trade measure, and have enthusiastically supported it as the first step in the destruction of the protective system. Men on this side of the Chamber have devoted their efforts to show that free trade in farm products will not hurt the farmer, and furthermore is in strict accord with the policies and platforms of the Republican Party. All of them have avowed themselves protectionists. All of them have opposed free trade except when it was baptized "reciprocity." Of course the catchword in the mouth of the advocates of this iniquitous measure is the high cost of living—an appeal to the populace—pass this measure and you will get free food. These are the gentlemen who perform the equestrian feat of riding two horses going in different directions at the same time. Free trade with Canada will reduce the price of the farmer's product to the consumer, but it will not reduce the value of the farmer's product to the farmer. Other gentlemen are honest enough to follow the President, who tells us in his message that this measure will not have any perceptible present effect upon prices, that high prices are world-wide, due to many causes, and that any effect thereon must be looked for in the future. If this statement were made to the kind of people whose support of this measure is gained by their belief in it as a relief from high prices, I apprehend there would be a sudden and wholesale desertion.

There is no intelligent man who does not know that there is nothing in the suggestion of relief from high prices by this measure that would justify a revolution in our revenue system, such a revolution as the enactment of this measure would inevitably bring about.

But there is a necessity to increase our foreign trade; hence we must have free trade with Canada in farm products. Here again I find myself in an impenetrable maze of argument, hopelessly groping for the light. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] tells us in one breath that our surplus is rapidly diminishing and that in the future we must draw from Canadian surplus or starve; and then, when he has recovered his breath from that statement, he tells us that we must build up Canada, so as to procure customers for our surplus. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to credit for an original plan for securing foreign trade. Build up the foreigner. "Remove this tariff," says the gentleman, speaking of Canada, "and she will soon gain the strength and stature of a great nation." "You increase the purchasing power of a customer, and you thereby increase your own prosperity," says the gentleman. I recall, in this connection, a quotation from Mr. McKinley's introduction to Mr. Curtis's book, "Protection and Prosperity." He says:

> The people of no nation in the history of the world has ever prospered under a policy which sacrificed home industries to build up and develop the resources and give employment to the labor of foreign states.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

We do not need this measure to secure the Canadian market. That market is already ours. The President tells us in his message that the entire foreign trade of Canada in the fiscal year 1910 was $655,000,000; that her imports were $376,000,000, and of this amount the United States contributed $223,000,000. In point of fact, to be exact, our exports to Canada last year, 1910, were $241,809,233. Our imports from Canada were $103,256,955. The balance of trade in our favor was $138,552,278, or 134.20 per cent of exports over imports. Our exports to all other countries were $1,622,682,411, and our imports were $1,459,667,296, the balance of trade in our favor being $163,015,115, or 11.17 per cent of exports over imports. We already have 60 per cent of Canada's trade. Talk about passing this measure for the purpose of securing foreign trade! That foreign trade we already have.

We do not need this measure to increase our trade with Canada. She is now our best customer. Why? Because she can not help herself. She is our best customer, not as a matter of sentiment, but because she can buy to better advantage in our markets than in any other. Self-interest compels her to deal with us. Why, our exports to Canada have increased from $28,000,000 in 1866, when the former treaty was denounced, to $241,000,000 last year. And they will go on increasing as the demands of the Canadian market increase and the ability of the American producer to supply increases, and nothing can prevent it unless it be some such bungling piece of statesmanship as this proposed treaty. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why antagonize the great farming interests of every State of the Union to pursue a mere will-o'-the-wisp? It is not statesmanship, it is not common sense.

But failing to find any other reason why we should abandon our ancient landmarks, the advocates of this measure rise to the plane of a lofty altruism, beautifully demonstrated by my friend from Massachusetts in his peroration. The Canadians, it is urged, are our neighbors; for 3,000 miles their boundary is our boundary; we are the same race, speak the same tongue, inherit the same traditions, and have similar institutions.

Well, what of it? What is this arrangement—a treaty of peace and amity, an arbitration agreement, or what the gentleman from Connecticut calls it—a plain business proposition, a question of national revenues, of common everyday dollars and cents? Sentiment is not business. Revenue measures are not made on sentiment. The Canadians do not pay our taxes, maintain our schools, our churches, or our charities; they do not build our roads, maintain our Army, or contribute to our Navy. They do not fight our battles. True, living alongside of us, they have been decent enough not to require us to maintain an army to keep them in order. [Applause.] But, true again, living alongside of them, we have not compelled them to maintain an army to keep us in order. True, we are coinheritors of the traditions of English liberty, but only down to the point where our fathers, through blood and sacrifice, extended that liberty to and established it in the United States, while the men of Canada remained still English dependents. Because in common we claim kinship with the great names of English literature, with Shakespeare, and Milton, and Byron, and Tennyson, with the exponents of English statesmanship—Burke and Fox and William Pitt—we may well rejoice. But it is a subject of rejoicing and not of business. It furnishes no reason why we should exchange a good American dollar for a Canadian half dollar. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Sentiment is a grand thing; it rules the world of civilized intercourse, but among cool-headed business men it has no place in the world of trade. It played no part in the long and bitter fisheries disputes with our dear Canadian brethren. It played no part in the settlement of Canada's irritating, arrogant, and unfounded claim in connection with the Alaskan boundary line.

If neighborhood and kinship of race and language and history furnish reasons why trade barriers should be removed, they furnish equally good reasons why political barriers should be removed and the two peoples consolidated under one flag. And disavow much as we may any intention in that direction, if we adopt this measure the force of events will ultimately assert itself to that end. This bill itself in its new section proposes another step toward bringing together the two peoples under one flag, and that flag will bear the Stars and Stripes.

O no, my friends, when it comes to a matter of sentiment my heart goes out to my own people; my patriotism is American, not Canadian patriotism; my brotherly love is for my own kin, for the American farmer, not for his Canadian competitor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the absence of any good reason why this bill should pass there are many and potent reasons why it should not.

It is unnecessary, not responsive to the popular demand, disturbing of the business interests of the country.

But more than that, it is unfair to the farmer, whose interests in particular it attacks.

I do not want to weary the committee with a restatement of the argument which has been so well presented by many of those who have preceded me. The history of American agriculture, its gradual extension westward to the possession of new and fertile fields, with the result that older and less fertile fields had to be abandoned, has been vividly portrayed. The similarity of the situation now, if the vast luxuriously fertile fields of Canada are to be brought into competition with our western farms, to the situation as it existed in our earlier years has been pointed out. The same economic law that worked to the disadvantage of eastern agriculture when western farms were established will operate as to Canadian and western farms, and in like manner and with like result.

It is easy to juggle with figures and by a proper selection of them establish almost anything. Doubtless there are some Canadian lands as high in price as some American lands, some places where there is little difference between Canadian wages and Canadian prices and our wages and prices, but they are the exception and not the rule, and anyone who will be honest with himself must agree that as a general proposition Canadian lands are cheaper than American lands, Canadian wages less than American wages, Canadian prices less than American prices; that Canada has a territory of vast proportions, capable of producing almost limitless quantities of grain from a soil fertile beyond any soil on this side of the international boundary line.

It seems to me, discarding special pleas, the conclusion must inevitably be that the possibilities of Canadian agriculture are such as to put American agriculture in competition with it at a great disadvantage. As a consequence, free trade with Canada in farm products must inure to the disadvantage of the American farmer. Taking the agreement as a whole, it can not but inure to the advantage of Canada and to the disadvantage of the United States.

We do not need to rely on theory to establish that proposition. It has already been established in actual experience. I need not enlarge upon this point, because it has been fully discussed both by myself in the last Congress and by various gentlemen in the course of this debate. I then asserted and now assert that the reciprocity treaty of 1854, which was denounced in 1866 and which is similar to the proposed agreement, worked disastrously to the United States and was denounced for that reason.

Gentlemen have denied both propositions. Without adducing any figures by way of proof, they dogmatically assert, first, that it did not operate against our interests, and, second, that it was denounced for political and not for economic reasons, one gentleman asserting that it was denounced on account of our indignation because of Canada's friendship to the Southern Confederacy. But there are two things that have not been and can not be denied: First, that under the operation of that treaty in 12 years our exports to Canada dwindled from nearly $20,000,000 to a little over $15,000,000, while Canada's exports to us grew from $12,000,000 to $46,000,000; that in the last two years of that treaty's life we remitted to Canada duties amounting to over $70,000,000 and lost the balance of trade by over $28,000,000.

These facts have not been and can not be denied. Nor can it be denied, in the second place, that every contemporaneous statesman of note in our history declared the treaty to have been disastrous to the interest of the United States and that it was denounced for that reason.

I recur to this proposition at this time only because in statesmanship, as in everything else, it is wise to take the lessons of experience. And if that treaty, through its 12 years of life under like conditions to those presented now, was disastrous to the interests of the United States, to all the interests of the United States, both her industries and her revenues, we have the right to assume—we would be foolish not to assume—that the enactment of this law now would bring about precisely the same results.

In this connection I ought to refer to the fact stated by the gentleman who preceded me, that ever since the denouncement of the Elgin treaty Canada has been importuning us to enter into a similar treaty, and to call attention to the fact that every administration, from that of Franklin Pierce down to the present administration, has refused to enter into negotiations with Canada for a treaty for the exchange of natural products. Why, so late as the administration of Mr. Harrison, in 1892, Mr. Blaine told the Canadian envoys that we would not entertain any proposition for an agreement looking to the exchange of natural products, because, he said "the benefits of such an exchange would be almost wholly with the people of Canada."

Talk about reciprocal treaties in competitive articles! Why, in the very nature of the case there can be no reciprocal treaty in competitive articles. Exchange of competitive articles means competition. Reciprocity means the trading of the things that we have for the things that we do not have.

But, Mr. Chairman, you may discuss the question of prices, you may discuss the question of agricultural interests, and many other incidental questions, and you will not, after all, have reached the fundamental and dominating issue in this case. Until this bill was introduced it was the universally accepted belief that the protective system, against that of free trade, was the accepted economic policy of the United States. Parties divided on rates of duties. The Republican Party stood for such duties as would furnish protection to American capital and American labor. The Democratic Party stood for rates of duty levied for revenue only. This bill looks neither to protection nor revenue. It deprives us of revenue. It is an open, avowed free-trade measure. It is such upon its face, and it is so declared to be by the Democratic Party.

Its significance lies in the fact—mark me, its significance lies in the fact—that this is the first step in the destruction of the protective system. That system is a complete logical whole, and it admits of no exceptions. It must apply to all industries, or it will not be permitted to apply to any. [Applause on the Republican side.] If the farmer can not have adequate protection for his industry, the manufacturer will not have protection for his. No system of protection is practicable or would be just some of whose schedules are protective and some of which are nonprotective.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who honored me with so much of his attentions, portrayed me as shedding tears for the farmer while I had in mind the manufacturer. The gentleman from North Carolina in part was right. I had both the farmer and the manufacturer in mind. When you direct my attention to the subject of a tariff I always have in mind the great city, dear to my heart, whose interests it is my highest ambition to serve. I recall its pillar of cloud by day, its pillar of fire by night, the roar of its machinery, its myriad workingmen in the receipt of the highest wages paid any workingmen in any place on earth [applause], a city which is a shining exemplar of the beneficent results of the system of protection. And when I have in mind the fact that if the farmer be robbed of his protection my great city will be robbed of its protection I refuse to participate in the robbery. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This measure rises high above mere considerations of temporary profit. It means more than bookkeeping and a balancing of accounts. It involves the integrity of a system whose foundation was laid in the first legislative act of the First Congress, which has received the indorsement of the most distinguished names in our history, and under which we have grown to a height of prosperity unprecedented in the world's annals. The system is essentially a Republican system. From the hour of its birth until this present hour the Republican Party has stood for protection; protection for American capital, for American labor, whether in the field, the factory, or the mine, to the end that there should be established a great home market which should be for Americans, and that the high standard of American civilization should be preserved.

Under its fostering influence cities have been founded, have grown and multiplied. North and South, East and West have been bound together in inseparable brotherhood by bands of steel. Progress has taken its resistless march across the continent, overcoming all the barriers of nature, planting fields and reaping harvests, until even the desert has been made to blossom like the rose. [Applause on the Republican side.] Its encouraging inspiration has given birth to a hardy race of pioneer sons, whose singleness of purpose, whose energy and aggressiveness and patriotism have given to the world the wonderful story of the winning of the West. [Applause on the Republican side.] Are we going to turn our backs on those hardy pioneer sons and their sons by the abolition of a system to which they owe their success and which is essential to its continuance? Already hundreds of thousands of them, lured by the promises of the luxuriantly fertile fields of Canada, have left their western farms to become a part of our neighbor's population and add to her wealth. Shall we tempt other thousands upon increasing thousands to abandon our fields for Canadian fields, taking with them the virtues that constitute good citizenship? Any policy that takes from us our boys and girls, the good red blood of American manhood and womanhood, that depletes the valley of the Mississippi and the plains of the West and lowers farm values here while increasing them across the border, robs us of our dearest and most valuable possession. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I can not stop to demonstrate at length why no Republican, in my judgment, can consistently vote for this measure. I would like to ask him one or two questions:

First. Do you not believe that the cost of production of farm products is less in Canada than it is in the United States? And if you do, then how can you escape the conclusion that to put farm products on the free list is to violate the pledge of the last Republican platform? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Second. Do you believe the testimony of the Mann committee and of the President's Tariff Board (and neither of these has been contradicted) to the effect that it costs from $2 to $4.14 more to make a ton of paper in the United States than it does in Canada?

If you do, then how can you escape the conclusion that to put paper on the free list is a violation of the pledge of the last Republican platform? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I beg for a conscientious reply to these queries. It is vital. The Republican Party as the party of protection is on trial here to-day. You and I, my Republican brethren, are on trial. As we respond, so shall we and our party, the party of McKinley, be dealt with in the great forum of the American electorate. Sometimes it is swayed by popular clamor, sometimes by the shadow of a great name, but in the end its deliberate judgment is true to righteousness; its last verdict invariably loyal to the loyal. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the enactment into law of this bill, in my judgment, marks the end of an era in the economic policy of our country so far as our customs laws affect the industrial conditions of the Nation.

The period of exclusion has passed; the era of honest competition is here. [Applause.]

For 50 years the Republican Party has maintained the policy of excluding from the home market, as far as it has been able to do so, competitive products from other countries.

In the beginning this policy was inaugurated with the express declaration that it was intended to develop new industries until they were strong enough to stand alone and face in the open markets of the world the rivalry of our productive competitors, but the greed for gain has driven the advocates of this theory far beyond the position they maintained at its inception. To-day there is hardly a great American industry that is not exporting its surplus products to the open markets of the world and selling them in free competition with the manufactured goods and crops of our foreign competitors.

Our agricultural implements supply the farmers' wants beyond the seas. Our boots and shoes are worn by people who speak many foreign languages and who tread the highways of the Occident and the Orient. The looms of our factories clothe the people of distant lands. The freight of our foreign rivals is carried to market on American rails, drawn by American engines, across chasms spanned by American-built bridges. [Applause.] The harvests of our farmers feed the toiling masses of Europe. We would be the unrivaled masters of production and industry in every land where free competition can be obtained if we would but strike off the shackles that bind us to the dead and unnecessary economic system maintained by the Republican Party, that creates false standards and wasteful conditions at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I recognize that these false standards have been engrafted on our industrial life and that we can not strike them all off in an hour or a day without serious danger. What I contend for is that we turn our faces away from them and gradually and carefully adjust our laws to meet the new conditions that face us, without serious injury to either labor or capital, in order that we may reduce the cost of living at home and be prepared to dispose of more of our surplus products in the markets of the world, to the end that we may give constant employment to labor and maintain stable prices at home.

The Democratic Party does not intend to abandon the custom-houses, but favors a policy of levying customs duties for revenue purposes only, at rates that will not destroy fair and honest competition in the home market. [Applause.] This position will be accomplished by the reduction of tariff taxes provided for in the laws now on the statute books to a point where fair competition will bring about reasonable prices and destroy monopolistic tendencies. [Applause.]

I say that this bill marks the end of an era in the economic life of the Nation. Why? Not that the immediate results will be far-reaching, but because it takes one step in the right direction, a step away from the exclusive protective policy, a step toward an honest competitive policy.

The advocates of the Republican policy of protection have always heretofore insisted that reciprocal trade agreements should only be made to affect noncompeting products. This bill embraces in its terms competitive products of both nations and recognizes the Democratic position that no tariff law is either warranted or just that protects the profits of the producer and destroys honest competition.

The bill under consideration will carry into law a reciprocal agreement negotiated by our Government with the Government of the Dominion of Canada. In the year 1910 the trade of Canada with all the world was $693,211,221; her total imports were $385,835,103; the people of the United States sending her $233,071,155 of this amount, and from the rest of the world she received only $152,763,940.

As the population of Canada is about 7,500,000 it appears that she bought from us about $30 worth of goods for each person living in the Dominion of Canada. This is a remarkable showing considering the fact that our trade is held back by tariff laws that as to the mother country discriminate against us.

Our own import figures show for the same year imports coming into this country from Canada to the amount of $95,128,310, about $1 per capita. They take of us $30 per capita and we take of them $1 per capita. They are a new country and a growing country. Of necessity they will take our products in excess of our taking theirs. Did not the great Eastern States three decades ago live and thrive on the development of the West? Will not the already developed States of the Union grow and prosper on the development of the new Provinces of Canada if you tear down the artificial wall and give us an opportunity for fair trade?

There has been a great deal said in the debate in the House about the farmers in the Northern States being opposed to this pact. It has been contended that the opposition to this pact comes from the agricultural classes of America. My friends, there is no doubt that to-day a number, and possibly a large number, of the farmers of the Northern States are opposed to this pact. Why? Because they have been assiduously campaigned by certain great protected interests that do not dare show their own hands above the surface. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They have been misled by false facts and false statements coming from men who desire to maintain the high protective principles of the Republican party, which protected their profits and made the toiling masses serve them as their masters. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have not had the suggestion made by those who oppose the bill that the real opposition was coming from the great protected lumber interests of this country [applause on the Democratic side], but we know it and you know it. I hold in my hand a circular letter, sent out by the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, of which Edward Hines, of Chicago, is the President—Edward Hines, of recent uncertain fame. Let me read it:

THE NATIONAL LUMBER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., March 17, 1911.

To members of affiliated associations:

DEAR SIR: As a member of an association affiliated with the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association you are doubtless interested in the proposed so-called reciprocity agreement with Canada and the action of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association against its adoption in its present form.

Lumber producers of the United States are doubtless interested in different degrees in this subject, but we believe that all feel that the singling out of the sawmills of the country to bear so large a share of the burden of this reciprocity, without any compensating advantages whatever, is in the highest degree unfair, and that we may be justly indignant, regardless of the degree of harm inflicted upon us, by treatment so discriminatory. The protest made to the Senate, a copy of which is sent you, contains a condensed statement of the chief grounds of objection to the agreement.

The agreement which, chiefly because of our efforts, failed to become a law at the last session of Congress, will, of course, be presented at the opening of the extra session, April 4, and we would call for your immediate personal assistance in so presenting the objections to the agreement to your Representatives in Congress and Senators, of whatever party, that this ill-considered and unreciprocal arrangement shall not become law.

Whatever the ultimate effect of the arrangement may be, it is evident that for the time being it will disturb business, upset values of lumber, tend to increase the value of Canadian stumpage at the expense of American, and will affect the credit of American lumber institutions.

We would suggest that you see your banks and discuss the agreement with them along these lines:

First. The credit of lumber concerns in the United States. The past three years have been severe ones in the lumber industry generally, and in some sections almost disastrous. The agreement will make matters worse, rather than better. Should not the banks use all their influence on those in power to prevent a further demoralization of a business which in some sections furnishes so large a portion of their business and revenues? And should not they protest against that which will inevitably tend to depreciate the value of the securities they hold?

Second. The agricultural features of the agreement tend directly to put American and Canadian agricultural land values upon an equality. American farmers have been going by the tens of thousands to Canada within the last few years because they could there get low-priced lands which are as productive or more productive than those at home, unless the latter are to be artificially fertilized at much expense. The extent and character of this movement of American farmers to Canada is sufficient proof of the facts. Our banks, insurance companies, private investors, and other financial interests have immense amounts of capital invested in American farm securities. Do they want the value of these securities depreciated?

Further, great efforts have been made during the last two or three years, with some success, to arouse renewed interest in American land investments, and therefore to check the movement of American farmers and capital to the Canadian Northwest. Great progress has been made in arousing interest in the long-neglected farm lands of the East, the cut-over lands of the South, North, and West, the swamp lands of the East and South, and the irrigated lands of the West. This movement, so promising to all our American interests, will receive a setback which will not be recovered from for years if the reciprocity agreement goes into effect, for with all the tariff barriers removed the cheaper Canadian lands will be as attractive, acre for acre, as those in this country.

American farmers who wish the value of their farm lands as well as of their products maintained should interest themselves in this matter, as indeed they are already doing, and the thousands of protests which came in from farmers and farmers' organizations during the last two weeks of the session did much to prevent the adoption of the reciprocity bill.

Your customers among the retail lumbermen in the agricultural districts of the North should be especially interested in the above arguments, for the passage of the reciprocity bill is certain, because of the feeling and apprehension it will cause among the farmers, with its reflex action upon the banks, to lead to a material curtailment of business and therefore lessen the demands of these customers upon yourself.

We would therefore ask you at once to take up this question with your banks and trust companies, land companies, and farmers (and with your retail yard customers, if you think it wise), and have them reach their Congressmen and Senators before the opening of Congress and continue the work after it convenes.

Your own protest, of course, will be emphatic, and we would suggest that you secure the cooperation of other lumber manufacturers who are not members of your association and so far as possible interest your workmen in the matter, as the adoption of the agreement, which admits Canadian lumber free into the United States, while Canada retains her restrictions on log exports, will necessarily stimulate the construction and operation of mills in Canada at the expense of those in this country.

I should be glad to be advised of how you feel about this matter and what you are doing regarding it. I inclose list of the Representatives from your State and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee of the new House, which is now at work on tariff revision, including the reciprocity measure.

Respectfully, yours,

THE NATIONAL LUMBER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
LEONARD BRONSON, Manager.

I call to your attention two paragraphs. He goes on to explain to his brother lumbermen the dangerous straits in which they find themselves, and urges them to call on their bankers and their grocerymen and their farmer friends to come to their rescue and save the downtrodden lumber interests. I read again one of the paragraphs in his letter:

American farmers who wish the value of their farm lands as well as of their products maintained should interest themselves in this matter, as indeed they are already doing, and the thousands of protests which came in from farmers and farmers' organizations during the last two weeks of the session did much to prevent the adoption of the reciprocity bill.

He refers to the last session of Congress. That is, the farmer who is contending for free lumber with which to build his humble home, the farmer for whom the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin says he stands, for whom he is calling for free lumber—this same farmer is appealed to by this Lumber Trust to defeat the legislation that gives him free lumber with which to build his home. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the trust goes further. Here is one of the concluding clauses of this letter:

We therefore ask you at once to take up this question with your banks and trust companies and land companies and farmers and with your retail yard customers, if you think it wise [laughter], and have them write their Congressmen and Senators before the opening of Congress, and continue the work after it convenes.

My friends, have you ever before heard of the great protected interests of the country, the great monopolistic interests, appealing to the bankers to put the pressure on the poor devil that has a loan to force him to stand for their interests? [Applause on Democratic side.]

Asking the banker! Here it is in black and white, a letter from Mr. Hines, the president of the Lumber Trust, appealing to the bankers of this country to put the screws to the farmers who had borrowed money from them, to appeal to their Representatives in Congress to maintain a high protective tariff for the lumber interests. That is not all.

I wish to read from the New York American a statement which a reporter gathered from Mr. Wakeman, the president of the American Protective Tariff League, the league that stands for prohibitive taxation for protecting profits in the interest of of monopoly. Mr. Wakeman issued a statement, sent out to those who stand with him, and his statement reads as follows:

Will you and your connections kindly wire the following Congressmen at Washington quick, urging them to vote against the Canadian reciprocity agreement?

I shall omit the names. It was an appeal to those protected interests to wire to you gentlemen on that side of the center aisle and to you gentlemen on this side of the House to vote against this bill because it was an attack on the protected interests of this country. When the newspaper reporter asked Mr. Wakeman if that was an official letter and if he stood for it, this was what he said.

That telegram was sent out Monday afternoon, after the executive committee of the league had met and authorized me to send it.

He further said:

We designated the men named because we have reason to believe they have been carried off their Republican faith by President Taft and are about to commit hara-kiri for themselves and the country by joining the Democratic House in indorsing the Taft un-Republican measure of reciprocity with Canada. What we aim at is to ally the Republican majority of the House as solidly as possible against reciprocity and thus make the unpatriotic Democratic majority wholly responsible for its passage. It will then go to the Republican Senate as a distinctly Democratic proposition, and then let the Republican Senate, if it dare, give its sanction to it.

Listen to your masters! [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The Senate of the United States, the body that in times past has protected the liberties of the American people, are told by the head of this Protective Tariff League that they dare not pass this bill. Afraid of whom? Not the people; afraid of the trusts. Ah, my friends, but it comes nearer home than that. The protected interests of this country know well that this bill will make a break in the dike; that whenever the protective tariff is removed and the northern farmer stands out alone without pretense of protection to his products that he can no longer be counted on to stand in the ranks of the monopolistic interests of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is why they are afraid of it. It is not so much what is in the bill, but they know that the death knell of the protection system will have sounded—that protection that means the protection of enormous profits and the creation of monopolies in this country—when the farmer understands and abandons the Republican Party to those alone who have fattened upon his hard-earned dollars. They are using, my friends, every effort in the districts on that side of the House and in your district, my fellow Democrat and in my district to break the column. I have protected interests in my district, but I do not represent them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I represent the great mass of my constituency who want honest treatment and fair play. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Two years ago, when the proposition came before the House to cut the tariff on iron and steel products, in many cases about half, I favored the proposition because I thought it was just and fair, but some of the protected interests in my district met and passed resolutions, and resolved that they would rebuke me if I voted to reduce the tax on iron and steel. I voted to make the reduction [applause on the Democratic side], but they did not turn me out of Congress [applause on the Democratic side], and they will not turn you out of Congress if you stand true to the people you represent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], when he addressed the House several days ago, stated that the United States Steel Corporation was in favor of this bill and asked if I did not know it, or if that was not the reason why I favored it. As I then stated to the gentleman from Illinois, I was not informed as to the wishes of the United States Steel Corporation. As a matter of fact, I am interested in the iron and steel business myself. Everything I have in the world is in the iron and steel business except my home, but not with the United States Steel Corporation. My people are independent manufacturers. We meet the United States Steel Corporation every day of our existence in a competitive battle on the industrial fields of America. My people have not asked me to vote for a protective tariff on iron and steel.

I stated to the gentleman from Illinois that I did not know the position of the United States Steel Corporation in reference to this bill, and at the time I stated it I did not know, but I will say to him to-day I do know. I know where they stand to-day. I am in receipt of telegrams from my district to-day stating that the United States Steel Corporation have stopped work on some of the great plants in my district, have turned 3,000 men out of employment, and have given as their reason that I was supporting the Democratic tariff bills that are before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I regret that this great trust should punish the constituency that I represent because of the position I take here, but I can say this to you: I stand to-day where I stood two years ago—for an honest revision of the tariff schedules. I propose to vote for this bill and the free-list bill without amendment because I believe they are right [applause on the Democratic side], and I care not what may be the effect on my personal fortunes if we can put on the statute books even the first step toward breaking down the system of monopolistic protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you want to vote for the trusts and the monopolies of this country, vote against this bill. If you wish to take this one step in breaking down the protective wall, there can be no question as to what your duty is to yourselves and your constituencies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They say that this bill is unfair because it brings the American farmer into competition with the Canadian farmer. Why should he not be brought into competition? Is there any reason? Members on that side of the Chamber may give as the reason that they believe in protecting the producers' profits, favoring special classes, and allowing the Government to guarantee to their favorites the right to tax the people.

They may make that statement, but we have never stood for such a proposition. I have never been able to see why the great manufacturers in my district, or the farmers, or anybody else, should have their profits protected any more than I can see why the grocer, or the mechanic, or the merchant, or the lawyer should have his profits protected by the Government.

Whenever you enter the realm of protection, of necessity you must enter the zone of protecting profits. And whenever you enact a tariff bill high enough to protect a man's profits, you have a tariff levied, not for revenue, but for the sole purpose of protection.

But why should we fear competition from these Canadian farmers? Their standards are the same as our standards. They are our people. There is no difference between us. The Canadian farmer lives in as good a home as the American farmer. His children go to as good a school and wear as good clothes. He has as much meat on the table and he indulges in the same luxuries. He lives up to our standard of life and living. Therefore, when we have him as a competitor we are not tearing down American standards in any way.

But they say he can produce cheaper. The climatic conditions of his country are more rigorous than are ours. Every year that he plants his crops he is in more danger of losing them, because the spring commences later and the fall begins earlier than with us. He must harvest more hay and grain to take care of his cattle in the winter and keep them in the barn longer than our farmers do, because there are nearly two months more of winter that the Canadian farmer has to contend with than does the farmer in the States. Can you say that this does not go into the cost of raising his crops? Is he not at that disadvantage? Why, no man can deny the proposition.

But they say he has cheaper land. The argument has been made repeatedly here that the cheap lands of Kansas and Minnesota 10 years ago did not destroy the high-priced land of Indiana and Illinois. You know that. Instead of the land of Illinois and Indiana being destroyed by the farm products that came from the cheaper lands of the West, the lands doubled in value. There is a greater difference in value in this country between the land in the Dakotas and Minnesota and Illinois and Indiana than there is between the land in the Provinces of Manitoba and Alberta and the land of Minnesota and the Dakotas. The reason the land is cheap in Canada is because they either can not produce as much per acre or, for the better reason, because they are farther away from the market and it costs more for freight to bring their commodities to the market of ultimate sale and to dispose of them than it does from the higher-priced land near the center of population. That is all there is to it.

There is not a single argument that can be advanced legitimately to show that the Canadian farmer can produce a crop of any kind cheaper than the American farmer can. Then, if that is the case, the sole argument that can be contended for on that side of the House in favor of maintaining this tariff in the interest of the American farmer is that his profits should be protected.

I wish my friend, my insurgent friend, my progressive friend from Wisconsin, were here. I would like to ask him if he stands for protecting the profits of the farmer. He stood with us last year on a great battle field for the rights of this House. But that was merely a parliamentary battle field. He proclaimed himself a progressive, a man that was in advance of his party. He said that he would not vote for the Payne tariff bill because it put unjust taxation upon the American people.

But when the gentleman faces the question of cutting off protection to the profits of his own constituency, he falters at the gate, and is unwilling to make those reductions for his own constituency that he desired to make for the constituency of other men. Ah, my friends, you may call that "progressive," but you only call it "progressive." I say to you that no man can reform the world unless he first be willing to reform himself.

Mr. CULLOP. I notice yesterday wheat in Winnipeg, Canada, was quoted at 92⅜ cents per bushel while in Chicago it was 89 cents a bushel, in St. Louis it was 86 cents and in Kansas City 84 cents per bushel. This seems to be about the difference daily of the Winnipeg market over the Chicago market. Now, if wheat is higher in Canada, as the quotations daily show, will removing the duty on wheat in any manner injure the farmers of the United States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will not.

Mr. CULLOP. Under the drawback clause of the Payne tariff bill, which provides that all duties on raw material brought into this country for manufacturing products for exportation are relieved of all tariff charges except 1 per cent of the tariff levied, which the Government charges for handling the transaction, is it not true that the miller can import wheat for the manufacture of his export flour, and instead of paying the tariff of 25 cents a bushel it is only 1 per cent of 25 cents a bushel, and he can thereby secure all such wheat from Canada or any other country practically without any tariff at all, so that the tariff on wheat, because of this fact, is practically removed now under the Payne bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. CULLOP. Chicago being the initial wheat market for the Mississippi Valley, does not the difference in price between places like St. Louis, Kansas City, and similar points represent the cost of transportation charges from said points to Chicago and the middleman's profit in handling the grain?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; that is true.

Mr. Chairman, we have discussed the wheat problem so much during the last few days in the House that I hardly feel as though I were justified in saying anything further in reference to that matter, but I want to call attention to this fact, that in the year 1910 the production of wheat in the United States amounted to 695,443,000 bushels. We exported 46,679,876 bushels, or 6.71 per cent. Canada that year produced 149,000,000 bushels of wheat and exported 49,741,350 bushels, or 33 per cent.

Now, I want to ask the other side this question: If the outside world, the markets of Europe, had not absorbed that 49,000,000 bushels of export Canadian wheat, if Canada had sent to this country every bushel of her export wheat, what would have been the result? The European market of necessity would have been 49,741,350 bushels behind the demand. They consumed that 49,741,350 bushels, and if you had taken it away from them and put it into this country, they would have been short that amount. If the European market had been short 49,741,350 bushels, would they not have been ready to consume 49,741,350 bushels of wheat from us at the world's price?

My friends, one strange thing about your party on that side of the House is that you are prepared at any time to deny the economic laws of the universe when it suits your purpose, and to reassert them when you desire to do so. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Fifteen years ago you denied—your leaders on that side of the House denied—the quantitative theory of money. You said that it did not make any difference how much money you had in circulation; it did not measure your values. And yet last year a distinguished committee of Senators representing your party filed a report on the cost of living in this country and asserted that the cost of living had increased because the amount of money in the country had increased and sent up prices by decreasing the purchasing power of the money.

Fifteen years ago you were on one side of the question and to-day you are on the other. Until this debate commenced, I never heard any man assert the theory that as to the great world crops, like those of wheat and cotton, the surplus crop, where a nation was continually exporting a portion of the crop, did not fix the price. And yet the exigencies of the day, the difficulties of the hour, have driven you to a position where you deny all economic laws and say that the value of your crop is not fixed by the surplus that you send to the markets of Liverpool and London. If they are—and they are, and you know it is true—then what difference does it make whether you have an artificial tariff barrier between this country and Canada or not, so far as your wheat crop is concerned, because the price of the wheat crop will be fixed by the price you obtain for the wheat that you send to European markets, just as our cotton crop in the Southern States is fixed by the world's supply and the world's demand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HELGESEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HELGESEN. If the gentleman will answer this one question, I think he can satisfy the farmers of this country that his side is right and that they are wrong on this question. I live in the State of North Dakota. Up there we have a town where half of the town is in North Dakota and the other half in Saskatchewan. One of the principal streets forms the boundary line. How do you account for the fact that the millers for years have been paying from 10 to 12 cents a bushel more for wheat, and the maltsters have been paying from 10 to 25 or 30 cents more for barley, and the merchants have been paying from 20 to 25 cents more for flax on the American side of that street than on the Canadian side? If the Liverpool market or the markets of the world control the price, how do you account for that fact?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is easy enough. I am not talking about local markets or local conditions. I of necessity recognize the fact, for example, that if the District of Columbia were the only market a farmer had in which to sell his produce in this neighborhood, and you put a policeman on the outer border of this District of Columbia and forced the farmer living in Maryland or Virginia to pay a tax for the privilege of bringing his produce into this particular town, it would be true that he could not sell his produce for as high a price outside as he could inside, because in the immediate local neighborhood his market is limited, and for him to take his produce to Baltimore or somewhere else would cost him additional freight charges. What I say does not apply to immediate local conditions. I have no doubt that, if this bill passes, there may be some towns in North Dakota where the price may be affected slightly. On the other hand, I have no doubt there will be some towns in Canada where the price will be affected adversely; but we as a Nation can not limit our legislation to the village from which the gentleman from North Dakota comes [applause on the Democratic side], nor can we fix our theories of the world's commerce from the standpoint of village wisdom. [Laughter and applause].

Mr. LANGLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that the Republican Party had changed its position on the quantitative theory of money from what it was 15 years ago. Is that correct?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It certainly has.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he and his party have changed their position from what it was 15 years ago on the question of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the theory that we advanced 15 years ago has recently been adopted as correct by a Republican Senate committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say this about these farm products. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], in his carefully prepared and able argument the other day, stated that the cost of living was not governed by a tariff wall, that the farmer did not get the benefit of the prices, but that the price was made by the middleman; and in order to sustain that position he asserted that an onion sometimes sold to the final consumer at a thousand per cent more than the farmer got for the onion when it left the farm. Now, that may be true as to onions. It may be true as to a few commodities, but I want to call your attention to one great commodity that goes on the table of every man, that is necessary to sustain the life of the Nation, and that is meat.

The difference between the wholesale price and the price to the consumer, as shown by the census figures in 50 cities, varies in different localities. In the North Atlantic States the increase above the wholesale price to the consumer is 31.4 per cent. In the South Central States it is as much as 54 per cent, but in 50 cities of the United States the average increased retail price to the consumer over the wholesale price is 38 per cent.

Does that sustain the argument of the gentleman that the wholesale price does not affect the value when it goes to the ultimate consumer? And the same thing is true in many other commodities.

I do not contend for a moment that the value of this treaty is in the fact that we are going to reduce the price of wheat either in this country or in Canada; I believe, though, that we will make a more stable market in both countries. I believe that we will prevent, to a large extent, speculators and manipulators from cornering markets and at times forcing exorbitant prices upon the people of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That may not be a good reason from the standpoint of you gentlemen who believe in protecting profits, but it is certainly a good reason from the standpoint of men on the Democratic side of the House who are opposed to any proposition that leads to monopoly or oppression. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] complains of the fact that the President of the United States sent this pact to Congress. Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress are responsible for its being here.

The President called Congress in extraordinary session two years ago to revise the tariff downward, not because he feared the people, but largely because certain large manufacturing interests were demanding changes that had become burdensome to them and the development of their foreign trade. The President was honest and ignorant; the standpatters were informed and cunning; the natural result followed, and they handed the President a "gold brick," that glittered without and was false metal within, when they induced him to sign the Payne-tariff bill.

But the complaining manufacturer was not to be put aside so easily; he knew the rates were still left as prohibitive as they were under the Dingley bill, and he wanted concessions made to advance his trade in foreign markets. They therefore agreed to give the President a "big stick," to be used for the manufacturer's benefit in the nature of the minimum and maximum provision of the Payne tariff law, whereby the rates provided in the bill were made the minimum rates and the maximum rates were an advance of 25 per cent ad valorem over the minimum rate and were to take effect at a later day if foreign nations did not make concessions in the interest of our foreign trade demanded by the President.

The end of the history is a short and sad one. The President went abroad with his "big stick," demanding concessions, and he came back without any material concessions and without the "big stick." Our stand-pat friends were advised that the coercion method would not work before they tried it. They knew France had made a failure of such a plan over two decades ago, but they could not put the tariff any higher than the Payne bill put it; they were unwilling to allow the President a chance to reduce it by making the Payne rates the maximum rate and authorizing the President to reduce it to a minimum rate. If they had done so, this legislation could have been avoided, and he could have probably accomplished his purpose in the main by conceding to Canada the minimum rates.

In the meantime the temper of the American people was such that the President dared not impose the maximum rate on Canadian products. So the President was forced to get out of the difficult position as best he could. The manner in which he did it was best told by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Canadian minister of finance, when introducing the pending reciprocity agreement at Ottawa:

The President of the United States—

Says Mr. Fielding—

as one evidence of his sincere desire to avoid trouble with Canada, did us the honor of inviting a member of this Government to proceed to Albany to meet him and discuss the matter. * * * It was not a question of putting on the tariff, but a question of taking it off, and I found the President of the United States was willing to take it off if we could give him some decent excuse to do so. * * * We made a few changes, a few concessions of no earthly importance, but they served the purpose and gave Mr. Taft the excuse he desired to refrain from imposing the maximum tariff against Canada. Out of this negotiation grew the larger negotiation of a more recent date. We were invited then to take up the greater question of the reciprocal trade agreement.

Now, is not that pathetic, the straits these bad standpatters placed their President in because they did not know how to arrange a maximum and minimum tariff rate, or were they again deceiving the President? Perish the thought!

Mr. Fielding says:

It was not a question of putting on the tariff, but a question of taking it off, and I found the President of the United States was willing to take it off if he could be given an excuse to do so.

It was an outrage that any political party should put our great country in such a humiliating position in the eyes of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, general debate is now closed, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fresh meats: Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats, excepting game, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out of lines 11 and 12 the words "1½ cents per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "1½ cents per pound."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will state frankly to the members of the committee that the purpose of offering this amendment and others which will follow, if they shall receive the support of the committee, is to strike out these products from the tariff list and to offer in their stead, when we reach that portion of the bill, an amendment placing meat and all meat products on the free list.

As I do not desire to speak at different times on this subject when the paragraphs are reached, I want to state my position. If there is one fundamental policy that ought to be adopted by the American Congress at this time, independent of politics, it should be a policy to curtail the power of the trusts, particularly those trusts which are, beyond dispute, in control of many of the common necessaries of life. It is a matter of current history that the chief operations of the great trusts at this time apply to the food products of the people, those things that must enter into the consumption of practically every home.

That the Meat Trust is a combination, an unlawful monopoly, we only need to refer to the records of our own courts where the prominent members and officers of these combinations are at this time under indictment for overworking their opportunities to corner and monopolize the meat products between the time they leave the farm and reach the table of the consumers.

This agreement places the farmer on the free list, and then keeps a liberal protection for the miller, the packer, the tanner, and leather manufacturer, and for everybody that is organized to reap big profits between the farmer and the consumer. It is about as bad as it could be framed to give further advantage to the middleman, who does his business between the producer and the consumer. Those people are doing pretty well now. About the only additional boost we could give them would be a larger free-trade market in which to buy while still protecting them liberally in what they have to sell. This the proposed agreement will do.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. The Payne-Aldrich bill provided for a duty of 1½ cents a pound on meat. Did the gentleman from South Dakota offer an amendment then to put meat on the free list? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I did not; but I will say that if it had been offered, the gentleman on the floor from South Dakota would have supported the amendment, if we had been compelled, as here, to put live cattle on the free list. He will support it here and now, and if you gentlemen will follow and sustain the products of the farm through the intermediate combinations that control prices to the consumer, and place the ultimate products of the farm free from the control of these monopolistic combinations I will support the amendment and support the reciprocity measure. Will the gentleman reciprocate and vote for the amendment that will give free food products to the consumer?

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Within a few days there will be a bill before the House to put upon the free list beef, mutton, veal, lamb, pork, and so forth. I shall vote for it; will the gentleman? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has answered my question in a manner that would have done credit to a part of the country north of the place where the gentleman resides. He has answered my question by asking another. I asked him whether he would support the amendment in this particular bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if various amendments to be offered are to be followed by a discussion of this kind I shall object, if the purpose is to mutilate this bill and ultimately to defeat it in that manner.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to the gentleman who has just yielded the floor fully answers all that can be said on the subject. The gentleman tries by his amendment to put meat on the free list coming from Canada. We have a bill prepared and reported to this House to put meat on the free list coming from all the world [applause on the Democratic side], and the gentleman will not vote for it when it comes up, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Well, the gentleman may be surprised on that score.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope I will be. I shall welcome the gentleman with open arms.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. There are several surprises that may be due the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this. I can say, on the authority of the President of the United States, that the only reason that meat is not on the free list in this bill is because the commissioners of the Dominion of Canada refused to allow it to be placed there. If you adopt the amendment offered, you will defeat the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have him explain why.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because it has got to go back, if it is changed, to the commissioners for a renegotiation, and that will destroy it at the present time and possibly for all time to come.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the gentleman read the Canadian bill? If he has, he will not make that statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have read the Canadian bill, and the gentleman and I evidently differ in our construction of it.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands that this pact prevents the Government of the United States from declaring free trade in meats between Canada and this country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does at the present time, as far as the agreement goes now. We have a third section added to the bill that I hope will ultimately lead to very much freer trade with Canada than this bill contains now. But I want to say once for all, the purpose of offering amendments to this bill is to defeat it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No man on this side of the House need fear that his vote will be misunderstood when he votes against amendments to this bill, no matter in what form they may come or from what source.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman did not understand the purport of the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Possibly not.

Mr. GARRETT. He asked if this treaty would prevent putting meats on the free list from Canada; that is to say, if it would defeat the purpose of the bill that is to come hereafter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, not at all. I did not understand the gentleman's proposition. Of course, the second bill will be passed if it becomes a law after this is signed.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would like to know what obligation we have with Canada in connection with this particular legislation that would deprive us, in honor and comity between nations, from amending this pact or legislation so as to place meat on the free list in this bill, which would not be of like force if on to-morrow we seek to accomplish the same thing by another bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it is very simple. This is in the reciprocal free list. If we change it here we force Canada to put meat on the free list herself, which she declines to do, and we will destroy the pact; but when this is adopted, if a Republican Senate will adopt and pass a Democratic bill, we will put meat on the free list from all the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on this paragraph be now closed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And all amendments thereto.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 125, noes 60.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of the next paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Nebraska had an amendment to offer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend in line 12, page 1, by striking out the word "pound" and inserting in lieu thereof "100 pounds."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, strike out the word "pound" and insert in lieu thereof the words "100 pounds."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I moved to close debate upon the paragraph and all amendment thereto, but I do not wish to cut off the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama to move to cut off debate on the pending amendment, but if the Chair is in error debate is closed on all amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may have five minutes in which to discuss his amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understood the Chairman in stating the motion to state that the motion was to close debate upon the paragraph, and the Chairman, as I understood it, did not say "all amendments thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. To be frank with the gentleman, the Chair's impression was that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama was to close debate on the amendment, but if the action of the House was to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments, why——

Mr. MANN. But the House votes on the motion as stated by the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly; but the RECORD will show how the question was put to the committee, and that controls the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not take up the time of the committee——

Mr. KENDALL. It ought not to be done by unanimous consent, but the gentleman ought to have the time as a matter of right.

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing, Mr. Chairman, to take the Chairman's word for it. If he so stated the motion, I did not understand the motion made or hear it stated that way, but I may be mistaken, being so far back in the Hall. If the Chair says that he stated the motion to include all amendments thereto, I will admit that the Chair has the right——

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD itself will disclose the actual fact, and in the absence of that the Chair, without objection, will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska to discuss the amendment he has just offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, would in effect put the items included in the paragraph here, "Fresh meats: Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game" on the free list. It will reduce the tariff to such a low amount that it would practically be free. I want briefly to reply to what the gentleman from Alabama has said in regard to the proposed amendments to this bill. I want to say to the gentleman and that side of the House that if this bill could be amended in certain respects, so as to make it, as I believe it would be then made, just and fair to the men and the classes from whom you take all the protection they now have, I would be willing to support the bill and vote for it. I want to say to the gentleman that he certainly must have misunderstood this bill when he says the adoption of such an amendment would defeat the so-called agreement with Canada. The agreement, or the bill, says we shall charge on the meats mentioned in this paragraph a rate of duty at 1¼ cents per pound. Why can Canada object and why under heaven should she have any reason to object if, instead of charging her 1¼ cents per pound, we said to Canada, "We will not charge you anything; you can bring it in free." There can be no reason given why any item named in the bill that is included in the imports coming from Canada should not be lowered or made absolutely free. There is no objection and there can be none. I know that the gentleman said that he is going to follow this bill by another one that will put these particular articles on the free list, but in order to make that sure and get the relief that he professes he wants to get by this bill—because, as he himself intimated, there is no assurance that the bill in which he intends to put that item will become a law [applause on the Republican side]—then he should favor this amendment. You compel the farmer to sell his product on a free-trade market, but protect the Beef Trust as soon as it gets possession of the farmer's steers. This amendment will put the Beef Trust on the same level, and it may give the consumer of meats some benefit, a thing he does not get as the bill stands.

So, if we run no risk, why not put those items in this bill that everybody admits and understands is going to be placed upon the statute books? I offer the amendment in the best of faith. I would be willing, as I said, if the bill were sufficiently amended along these lines, to support it and to vote for it, as the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] said he would. But, if you go on the theory that by caucus action you are going to control a majority of this House on matters of legislation and give to your fellows the simple promise that you are going to give us relief in a different bill which you do not believe yourselves is going to be enacted into law, it seems to me that you are not acting wisely, at least.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"] The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars, 1¼ cents per pound.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "1¼ cents per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the members of this committee that it is not my habit to take up the time of the House by offering amendments for the purpose of delay, and if I am not interrupted in these five minutes I can say all I desire to say on this subject. It is to my mind so vital if this legislation is to be of any benefit to the people that I think one or two minutes should be given to this particular phase of the question before we pass to a final vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the gentleman will assure me that if I have to have a little more time it will not be objected to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course I can not give that assurance. If the amendment that the gentleman is proposing, to put articles on the free list, is adopted, will he vote for this bill?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes; I will, if the gentleman will aid me in putting them on this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in this bill, but in the other bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is there any probability of that bill becoming a law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From the complexion of the Senate, controlled by the gentleman's party and the way they have acted in the past, I will say no.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, this colloquy has disclosed the real purpose of the Democracy in this matter. They are willing to vote to cripple the trusts in a proposition and upon a bill that they themselves know has no chance of passing, but they are not willing to come forward and do it in a bill that may pass. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of this committee to a fact that, so far as I have observed, has not been called to the attention of the committee at all. The Canadian treaty that went into effect in 1854 not only provided that cattle should go on the free list, but that all meat products should go there; not only that wheat should go on the free list, but that all flour and products of grain should go on the free list; not only that hides should go on the free list, but that products of leather should go on the free list. We are here proposing to give to the trusts of this country an advantage which they very much desire but do not need. We are not striking at a single trust in this legislation, except the Print Paper Trust. We are fortifying the powers of the Meat Trust, of the Cereal Trust, of the Leather Trust, of the Flour Trust, and of the Barley Trust by assuring them of a free-trade market in which to buy their products and protecting them by a high-tariff wall against selling their products to the American people. I would like to see the gentleman display a loyalty as great as his frankness and agree with his colleagues to vote for a measure that is likely to become a law in order that we may give real relief. What will be the operation of this bill? Let us see. It will probably reduce the price of wheat in this country something like 10 cents a bushel, from the best statistics. How many bushels are there in a barrel of flour? Practically four and one-half.

The wheat that goes into a barrel of flour after this bill passes will probably cost the miller about 50 cents less by reason of this agreement—4½ bushels, at a reduction of 10 cents per bushel. And, with remarkable cleverness, exactly 50 cents per barrel of flour is given to protect the millers of Minneapolis when they sell it to the American consumer. No reduction of the price of flour is likely to result, therefore, from this legislation.

It is proposed to put cattle upon the free list, but protect the packer's fresh meat at $1.25 per hundred pounds. The packer will buy the farmer's 1,000-pound steer from Canada free of tariff duty. The steer will make, approximately, 650 pounds of fresh beef, upon which the packer is at once protected to the amount of $8.12½, which is a larger profit than the American farmer has made on a like steer after three years of care and expenditure. This $8.12½ protection to the packer on the meat is but little less than the present tariff duty on the live steer. There is little probability, therefore, that any reduction in the price of cattle will filter through to the ultimate consumer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COVINGTON. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the hypocrisy of gentlemen on that side of the House is very apparent. They pretend that they wish to protect the American consumer from the operations of the Beef Trust, and yet they are now engaged in a performance which, even if successful, would bring no relief whatever to the American people from the exactions of the Beef Trust. Canada refuses to put meats on the free list because Canada is afraid that the Canadian consumer would be placed at the mercy of the Beef Trust of this country if American beef was allowed to go free of duty into Canada. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just one moment. The one thing that will bring relief to the American people will be to put on the free list fresh meat coming from every country of the civilized world, so as to permit the importation of meat from Australia, the South American countries, and from every other great meat-producing country in the world, in order to have effective competition with the Beef Trust. But, Mr. Chairman, with an ingenuity for which gentlemen on that side of the House are famous, they pretend to be endeavoring to give relief to the American people by demanding that beef be allowed to come into this country from Canada free when all Canada and everyone else knows that no beef would come here if Canadian beef were put on the free list, but that the Beef Trust would go into Canada and take charge of that industry there, if it had a free market in Canada, and still hold the American market.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman, Has Canada any objection to the importation of meat from Canada to this country free?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what I am trying to make very clear. Canada knows that no beef will come into this country, no matter what the tariff rate from Canada is, and inasmuch as this is a reciprocal agreement, the duties and rates are the same, whether articles come from one country or the other.

The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] both voted against this reciprocity agreement in the last Congress when it was pending in the House. It may be that some gentlemen have heard them raising their voices in favor of free meats when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration here, or under consideration in another body, but my recollection does not bring to mind the figure of the gentleman from South Dakota discussing that question or urging it upon the Members of this House. The attempts to amend this bill are, in my opinion, made for but one purpose, and that is to arouse so much antagonism against this agreement in Canada and to create so much distrust and opposition there against it that, while it will not be beaten in the United States, it will fail to receive the approval of the Canadian Parliament. That, in my opinion, is the purpose of the gentlemen on that side who are endeavoring to amend this measure and attempting to persuade Members of this House that in so doing they are seeking to relieve the American people from the high prices that are exacted for food products.

If the gentleman from South Dakota desires to help in relieving the people of this country from the exactions of the Beef Trust, let him hold his soul in patience and vote for the free-list bill that will be offered here, and which will provide for the free importation of meat, so that the Beef Trust will no longer be in a position to extract money unjustly from the American people.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would say to the gentleman, Yes, I will vote for that bill; but the gentleman may rest assured that it will not pass.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. JAMES. Why will it not pass? Will the gentleman's party defeat it in the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, if the proposed bill does not become a law, will this other proposition become effective?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not expressing my opinion as to whether that measure will become a law in the future, because my experience with the party with which the gentleman has so long been associated leads me to believe that nothing but a supernatural agency would convert certain gentlemen in his party to the policy of serving the interests of the people, and I do not look for that in the immediate future. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, Why not permit a vote to be taken on amendments to this measure in order to avoid that very contingency, no matter from what side it may come, whether from my party or from his party? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman's suggestion is plausible, but the applause which he receives comes from those who have been opposing this bill during this debate.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman not know that there are already two amendments on this bill as it came originally from the State Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, I do; and I know that the administration of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been a wheel horse for some years assured this side of the House that those amendments will not jeopardize the enactment or approval of this law, either here or in Canada; and the criticism of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] should have been made in the White House and not in the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I shall be glad to be recognized, just to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I have heard the thunders roar before.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] counsel that no amendment shall be offered to this bill, for the reason that they say the bill covers the pact or agreement made by the President of the United States with the Canadian commissioners, and that this is an effort to vitalize that pact or agreement by legislation, and that it can not be amended without the permission of Canada, that Canada would not consent, and that the agreement would fail. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what assurance he has that, in section 2 of this bill, page 23—

Pulp wood, mechanically ground—

And so forth, which is not according to the pact or agreement, but an amendment to that agreement, will be accepted?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to state the assurance we have?

Mr. CANNON. I yield for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding of the history of that amendment is that at the request of the executive department of the Government, either directly or indirectly, that particular amendment to section 2 was prepared by the distinguished gentleman who now heads the minority of this House, and assurances were received from the Executive, after consultation with the representatives of the Canadian Government, that this amendment would not jeopardize the pact, but would be accepted by Canada. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. When gentlemen get through applauding I will try to take the remainder of my time without interruption. By what grapevine telegraph has that assurance been given? In what public document does it appear? If you can amend the agreement in one respect, why can you not do so in another? It is proposed to amend it in section 2, and if that amendment is adopted the pact is broken, unless Canada accepts the amendment. [Laughter.] I will discuss section 2 when we come to it. I think I know why you amend section 2. You have not stated the reason. I will ask you to state it later; but I think it is a very thin argument to make in the American House of Representatives, which originates revenue bills—except this one [laughter]—that the pending bill can not be amended because Canada will not have it. Great heavens! Let us bring Canada down here and surrender the Hall of the House to her. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Canned meats and canned poultry, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 6 by striking out "twenty" and inserting "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in line 6, strike out "twenty" and insert "one."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic majority are in desperate straits. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] I say the Democratic majority are in desperate straits indeed when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] feel forced to resort to the arguments they have made upon the preceding amendments. The gentleman from Alabama stated first that if this amendment was adopted the bill would have to go back to the Canadian Parliament. If the gentleman had examined the Canadian bill carefully, as a lawyer, he would never have made that statement, for I have too much confidence in his fairness to this House to believe that he would intentionally have misled it.

Day before yesterday I read a portion of the Canadian bill into the RECORD. I challenged then any lawyer in this Chamber to rise and say that putting a free list of imports into this country would affect that bill in the slightest degree. I renew that challenge now. The gentleman from Alabama next said that if we adopted this amendment that this was reciprocal, and that we would have to make the Canadian side of the bill the same. I want to say that if the gentleman had read his own bill carefully he would not have made that statement, because this does not purport to be reciprocal in any degree, for the proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the duties above enumerated shall take effect whenever the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that on the articles hereinafter enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), when imported therefrom into the Dominion of Canada, duties not in excess of the following are imposed, namely:

We do not propose to touch the Canadian side of the agreement upon these duties. [Applause on the Republican side.] Gentlemen of the majority, you are trying to deceive the country this afternoon in your action of to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no reason, if your are acting in good faith in desiring to lower duties, why you should not vote for these amendments, and the reason you are not is because you do not want to legislate for the country. You propose a little later to support a bill which you believe will be vetoed and not become a law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the same solicitude for the Canadian people which moved him and his associates to offer these amendments is the same solicitude which moves them to vote against this reciprocity treaty with Canada? [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the gentleman that I am going to vote for the amendments, every one of them, and I am going to vote for the free list, although without having any confidence that we shall secure the legislation. But if we would adopt these amendments, we would have legislation of some benefit to the consumers of the country, instead of only supposed political issues for you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, just for a moment I want to engage in a little uncovering of motives. I saw the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota to put meat on the free list. When I saw that I began to think of his record in the past. I think I have heard him say that he was for the free admission of nothing into America. He wanted the tariff wall so high that nothing could get over it. What reason has the gentleman for wishing to inject into this reciprocity bill these free-list measures? It must be along these lines that they know that every man who conscientiously will support one of these amendments putting certain items on the free list in this bill will likewise vote for it on the free list introduced by the gentleman from Alabama and now pending here, and they know that every Member who is at heart opposed to this bill will vote to put these items on the free list in this bill and then vote to defeat the bill. If they get these items on this bill here, they will kill this bill in the Senate, or else, if there are enough Members in the House and Senate honestly in favor of the free items now urged by them, then our free-list bill will go through the Senate. You can not be for the free-list items in this bill and against them in the other. And Senators in the other end of the Capitol can not be for free items in this bill and against them in the next bill on the calendar. If this bill will pass the Senate with the free-list items in it, so will the free-list bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama. When the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] voted to put meat on the free list in this bill, I looked with suspicion upon the motives of the whole party back of him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] may be honest and sincere, but when he sees the company he is moving with he ought to know he is blind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of stating my reasons for opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. There seems to be some question as to the exact effect of that amendment, together with the amendments offered by the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from South Dakota. These gentlemen say that the effect of the adoption of their amendments would be merely to change the duty imposed by this bill upon Canadian products and not change the duty imposed by Canada upon the American products. Now, if that is true, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is simply that canned meats and poultry coming from Canada into this country would be received at a duty of 1 per cent ad valorem, and the meats and poultry going from this country to Canada would be charged 20 per cent ad valorem. But the gentleman from Wisconsin says that Canada will not object to this; that Canada would be glad to have her canned poultry come in here at a less duty than she imposes on our product. Of course, that would be for the benefit of Canada. Of course, Canada would not object; but, Mr. Chairman, how about all the other countries of the world with whom we have the most-favored-nation clause in our treaties? The effect of this amendment would be simply this: We would be giving to Canada a preferential of 95 per cent which we accord to no other nation and for which Canada gives us no adequate consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If it be true that that would be giving Canada something for which we get no consideration, then is it not true that the bill unamended would have the same effect that the gentleman is afraid of, because we are giving to Canada something and getting nothing in return? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the contrary; in my view there is abundant consideration for this agreement on both sides just as it stands. Therefore, we must not by amending this bill give Canada much lower duties than she gives us on the same articles, so that some other foreign nation can say that we are discriminating in favor of Canada in that particular, giving Canada advantages which we do not accord to them.

Mr. NORRIS. The duties are not all the same.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I decline to yield further, Mr. Chairman. It is perfectly apparent that it is just as dangerous to the success of this bill to put Canadian products on the free list where Canada does not reduce her duty against us as to reduce or raise other duties which we have reason to believe Canada would not accept. That is one other way of beating this bill. There are two ways of defeating the bill. One is to make an amendment which Canada will not agree to, and the other is to make an amendment which will violate the most-favored-nation clause with other nations. I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, as a Republican, and as one who is in favor of this bill as it stands. I propose to vote against any amendment offered for whatever purpose which may result fatally to this bill. I am content in this matter to follow the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against every amendment proposed to this bill, including even the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the last word, now pending.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will withdraw that pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I am speaking in opposition to it, and the gentleman can not withdraw it. I do not take this view under the mistaken apprehension that it is not within the power of Congress to amend the bill without in any way affecting the agreement entered into by the two countries. [Applause.] I do not disguise from myself the fact that it was wholly within the spirit and the letter of the agreement to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], now pending, or any other amendment which reduces the rate of duty on articles coming from Canada into the United States without in any way affecting the rate of duty on articles coming from the United States into Canada. There are a number of items in this bill that are not at all reciprocal, a number of items in the bill in regard to articles coming from Canada into the United States that are not mentioned in the list of articles going from the United States into Canada. There are a number of articles mentioned in the list going from the United States to Canada that are not mentioned in the list of articles coming from Canada to the United States. For instance, we put a duty of only 10 cents a ton on iron ore coming from Canada into the United States, in consideration of Canada putting a duty of only one-half a cent a pound on unshelled peanuts and 1 cent a pound on shelled peanuts coming from the United States into Canada, because neither of those items is found in the corresponding list of the other country.

It would be quite within our power under the favored-nation clause, in my judgment, to admit meats free of duty coming from Canada into the United States in consideration of Canada admitting meats at a cent and a quarter a pound coming from the United States into Canada. It is quite within the province of the favored-nation clause and the agreement to do this, but it would not be good sense, in my judgment, and I shall vote against that amendment and other amendments. I appreciate the difficulties on the other side of the House in voting down these amendments which are in order, which would not invalidate the agreement, in my opinion.

I am in favor of carrying out the agreement and entering into reciprocal relations with Canada, but I appreciate the fact [applause] that while amendments might be made, they would result in defeat of the bill in the end.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. My distinguished colleague from Illinois, distinguished in many ways, has stated that section 2 of the bill relating to pulp and paper was not in accordance with the agreement. With what little knowledge I have been able to gain, after partly, if not at least helping in, preparing the amendment or the section in the bill and in part the provision in the agreement, I am prepared to say that section 2 of the bill to the letter carries out the agreement entered into between the two executives and does not depart in the slightest degree from the terms of the agreement. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted; debate is now proceeding by unanimous consent and—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] Regular order is demanded. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearine, and animal stearine, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, having had no time during general debate, I avail myself of the privilege of offering the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, for the purpose of reading or having read into the RECORD a poem on reciprocity composed by the poet laureate of the city of Washington, Col. John A. Joyce; and I may be pardoned for suggesting that our poets are not usually inspired by what is bad, but generally by what is good. I ask the Clerk to read it in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECIPROCITY.

Reciprocity is good
In the field and farm and wood
To intertwine our brotherhood.

Reciprocity is best
For each honest, loving guest,
From the East unto the West.

Reciprocity is grand
To tie us to a brother land,
Equality of heart and hand.

Reciprocity is wise,
Without greed or base disguise,
And no secret, liquid lies.

Reciprocity is love,
Gentle as a cooing dove,
Born from glorious climes above.

Reciprocity to feel,
In our woe or in our weal,
That we get a strong, square deal.

Reciprocity, fore and aft,
With all nations, scorning graft,
Through the voice of big Bill Taft!

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. The gentleman states the verses are signed by John A. Joyce. Does that settle the question between John A. Joyce and Ella Wheeler Wilcox as to who is the author of "Laugh and the world laughs with you"? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Egg yolk, egg albumen, and blood albumen, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats excepting game; bacon and hams, not in tins or jars; meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner; canned meats and canned poultry; extract of meat, fluid or not; lard and compounds thereof; cottolene and cotton stearine, and animal stearine; tallow; egg yolk, egg albumen and blood albumen, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, shall be imported therefrom into the United States free of duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is obnoxious to paragraph 3 of Rule XXI with which, perhaps, the gentleman is not familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont desire to be heard?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do not if the gentleman insists upon his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not waste time on these frivolous amendments.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I ask for a ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment undertakes to put upon the free list certain articles being imported from the Dominion of Canada. The paragraph just read is part of the section relating to the dutiable list of articles imported into the United States from the Dominion of Canada, and the amendment is not germane to it. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barley malt, 45 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, there are two distinctive, fundamental principles of government, upon the one or the other of which all governments are founded and rest. These principles are directly the opposites of each other. In one the theory of concentration of power and authority prevails, and in the other the diffusion of the power and authority of government prevails. In the monarchy the sovereignty of government is concentrated largely in the hands of a few, while in the democracy the sovereignty of government is disseminated among the masses of the people, who exercise the power and control of government. Where power is vested in a few the theory prevails that the few possess and are entitled to have superior privileges and benefits and that the authority of government can rightfully be used to foster and benefit the business and the welfare of the favored few. In the democracy the cherished idea of equal rights and exact justice to all and special privileges to none pervades and should dominate its institutions of government and the legislation of the country.

There are also two theories of taxation and two distinctive lines of public policy along which the taxing power is exercised. The Democratic Party teaches and boldly asserts that the taxing power of the Government—that power which the Government has and exercises to take the private property of the individual citizen—can only be exercised rightfully for the purpose of raising revenue for governmental purposes to maintain the Government honestly and properly administered, and that when this purpose is accomplished the taxing power of the Government ceases; but the Republican Party disputes this limitation of the taxing power and asserts that the Government has the right and should exercise the taxing power for purposes other than the governmental purpose of raising an adequate revenue to maintain the Government. In keeping with these assertions, for more than 40 years the Republican Party has exercised the taxing power for purposes other than revenue purposes. It boldly asserts that the Government has not only the authority, but that it should exercise the taxing power for the purpose of protection.

Let us clearly understand and illustrate what the doctrine of protection means and how it operates.

For illustration, we will say that in New York, or New Jersey, or Ohio, or Tennessee, or elsewhere in the States of the Union, certain individuals are engaged in business, and the profits realized are not as large as they think they are entitled to, and in order to increase their profits it is proposed, under the theory of protection, to exercise and use the taxing power of the Government so as to require the purchasers and consumers of their goods to pay a larger price and yield a larger profit. For instance, we will say that an importer of hats can buy them abroad at such a price that they can be sold to the consumer at a reasonable profit at $1 each. When he arrives at the port of entry he is met by a customs officer who informs me that before he can enter the goods into this country he must pay a certain duty, and he inquires why and for what purpose. A Democrat tells him that he is to receive the benefits of the markets of our country and that it is just and proper that he should pay a reasonable amount toward raising the revenue necessary to properly maintain the Government; but a Republican says to him that independently of the question of revenue for governmental purposes he must pay a tax for the sake of protecting and fostering the business of the manufacturers of hats in New York or Tennessee, and that these manufacturers desire to sell their hats at a dollar and a half each, and in order to enable them to do so a duty will be levied upon his hats to force him to sell his hats at a dollar and a half each, and thereby enable the home man to exact a larger price and larger profit from his customers. This simple illustration brings out forcefully the difference in principle between the exercise of the taxing power for revenue purposes under the Democratic theory of government and the exercise of the taxing power for the purposes of protection under the Republican theory of government. It will be borne in mind that the increased price of the hat made here does not inure to the benefit of the revenue of the Treasury, but goes wholly into the business of the private manufacturer, and when it is further remembered that for every imported article upon which the Government receives revenue there are at least 10 times as many homemade articles, it is easy to understand how the taxing power of the Government is used to levy tribute under the Republican policy upon the labor and toil and the production of the masses of the people for the purpose of building up the fortunes of a favored few; and when we enlarge this illustration to embrace the vast number of articles used in this country, amounting to billions of dollars each year, we can have some idea of the enormous tribute paid by the masses of the people under this perverted use and exercise of the taxing power, and which goes as tribute into the coffers of the protected classes, and we can get a further insight into the methods by which the colossal fortunes have been piled up in this country.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that when one industry is protected every other industry demands similar protection, and the individuals receiving these benefits bind themselves together and cooperate under a community of interest, not only for the maintenance of their own favored position, but to encourage others to join with them and thereby strengthen and insure the continuance of the policy of protection by which they fatten and grow rich; and thus it is—the political poison spreads, and one artificial condition succeeds another until the natural laws of supply and demand as regulators of trade and commerce are largely destroyed and supplanted by the agreement of combinations formed in restraint of trade; and thus it is that trusts spring up and prosper in every department of business which receives this protection, and the great mass of the people are continually paying tribute to these trusts and combines through the wrongful exercise of the taxing power of the Government. The history of tariff legislation in this country has been that the tariff taxes have continued to grow higher and higher, and the stronger and richer the enterprises become which receive the benefit of tariff protection, the more insistent they become that it shall be perpetually continued and maintained at a higher rate. Right economic laws can not be violated continually with impunity, and we have to-day, and have had for years, many illustrations of wrongs and grievances done to the American people because of these abuses of the taxing power and using the Government as an agency to take the money of some of the citizens for the benefit of others. Conditions became so intolerable and public sentiment became so incensed that the mass of the people at the last election revolted against this policy and in no uncertain terms have demanded a return to a proper and rightful exercise and use of the taxing power of the Government, and have commissioned the Democratic Party to discharge this trust, and the President of the United States, realizing the demand of the people that the tariff tax shall be lowered and the wrongs righted, has submitted for the consideration of the Congress the Canadian reciprocity treaty, and it is my purpose to state my position with reference to the pending legislation. Some of my people have requested me to vote against Canadian reciprocity legislation, and, as I was unable to do so, and desire to place before them and this body some of the reasons why I was unable to do so, I shall use as a part of my remarks my letter in reply to their petition, which letter is as follows:

"I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant inclosing a petition bearing 261 names asking me to work and vote against the passage of the pending Canadian reciprocity treaty legislation.

"In reply I beg to say that I am always glad to have an expression from all of my constituents of their views on pending legislation and always give careful and conscientious consideration to their views and wishes. I fully realize the high character of the signers to the petition, and that very many of them are my warm personal friends.

"I wish to observe that I am now and have all my life been interested in farming and everything I have is invested therein, and my son, just starting in life, has chosen farming as his life work, and I am sure that you will appreciate that from every standpoint I am deeply interested in the welfare and prosperity of the farmers, and that it is my desire to do all I can to promote and advance their interests and success. However, it is my mature judgment, after much consideration, that you and they are unnecessarily agitated over the supposed results of this legislation, and I will give you some of the reasons which move me to pursue the course which I do. And, as it is impossible for me to write personally to each of the signers of the petition, I shall take the liberty of publishing this letter to you as my reply to each of them.

"First. During the last session of Congress the Democrats met in caucus and gave full consideration to this legislation, and by an overwhelming vote adopted it and made it a Democratic measure. During the present session of the newly elected Congress another caucus was held and the matter again considered, and again, by an overwhelming vote, was made and declared to be a Democratic measure. I may add that it has the support and indorsement of all the Democratic leaders of the country. Now, if I should work and vote against the bill I would not in the least change the result of anyone's vote other than my own. But I would, by so doing, subject myself to exclusion from the future caucuses of the party and from participation in its future councils, and I would be placed in a position of political alignment with the high protective tariff wing of the Republican Party. I feel confident that it is not the desire that I should be placed in this position.

"Second. For time out of mind the Democratic Party has declared that the tariff on farm products in this country was of no advantage to the farmers of the country, and did not affect in any way the price of farm products. The Democratic Party has uniformly declared that as this country was a large exporter of farm products which were sold in open market competition of the world that the price of farm products in this country was controlled and governed by the price of the surplus sold abroad. This is a fundamental, economic proposition, which, it appears to me, will not be controverted. For more than 25 years throughout my district and in other places of the State and in other States I have advocated this political doctrine and have declared for these political principles and policies of tariff legislation, and, so far as I have been able to observe, they have always met the cordial and enthusiastic support and indorsement of the Democrats of all vocations of life. The Democratic Party has repeatedly declared—and so have I—that the tariff on farm products was levied for the purpose of attempting to justify what we consider excessively high duties upon other articles which are affected in price by the tariff. Now, I am asked to reverse this position and, by my vote, assert that the tariff on farm products does affect and control prices, and thereby to approve and indorse the political teachings of the Republican Party. I feel confident that, upon reflection, I will not be asked or expected to do this. When I call your attention to the fact that during the last 10 years we exported and sold abroad 812,239,651 bushels of wheat and, in addition, 144,945,543 barrels of flour, or, if I call your attention to the fact that during the same time we exported and sold abroad $1,975,278,025 worth of breadstuffs, made of farm products, you will at once realize not only the vast magnitude and importance of our foreign trade to the farmers, but you will realize that the prices of these sales abroad fix absolutely the prices of farm products at home.

"Third. But let us deal especially with Canada. During the last five years ending June 30 last, in goods of all kinds—

We sold in Canada	$886, 417, 376
Canada sold to us	393, 913, 673
Difference in our favor	492, 503, 703

"These figures show that Canada is a good country for us to trade with. Any country which buys from us more than it sells to us is a good country to trade with. No tariff wall should stand between us and such a country.

Horses:
We sold in Canada	$14, 172, 075
Canada sold to us	2, 549, 201
Difference in our favor	11, 622, 874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1, 578, 179
Canada sold to us	1, 193, 796
Difference in our favor	384, 383
Meat and dairy products:
We sold in Canada	17, 011, 017
Canada sold to us	904, 191
Difference in our favor	16, 106, 826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31, 596, 556
Canada sold to us	6, 679, 884
Difference in our favor	24, 916, 672
Corn:
We sold in Canada	21, 704, 572
Canada sold to us	14, 350
Difference in our favor	21, 690, 222
Wheat:
We sold in Canada	4, 442, 307
Canada sold to us	766, 254
Difference in our favor	3, 676, 053

"These official figures of our trade with Canada for the last five years show that she is a pretty good customer of the farmers of the United States, and that she is a country whose trade the farmers should cultivate and seek.

"It has been shown that a mixture of Canadian wheat and American wheat makes a higher and better grade of flour which commands a better price in the markets of the world than the flour made from either alone. Canada ships her surplus wheat to Liverpool and other foreign markets the same as we do, and the only difference is the question of freight rates, elevator facilities, etc. It is claimed by those who are competent to judge that if the United States could control through her own ports the shipment and export of Canadian wheat that it would enable this country to better regulate and control the price of wheat and steady its price and prevent corners and excessive fluctuations.

"Canada raises grass-fed cattle, but is unable to make corn-fed beef. The farmers of the United States have a surplus of corn and other cattle-feeding products, purchase the grass-fed Canadian cattle and corn-feed and sell them to a greater advantage, thereby utilizing their farm products to a better profit.

"Let me illustrate: The farmers of our section likewise raise corn and hay. They go into other States and purchase young mules and feed them and ship them, when grown and fattened, to other States at a nice profit, thereby making their farms more profitable and furnishing use and consumption for their corn and feedstuffs. Would our farmers think it a wise policy to be compelled to pay a tax of $25 or $30 per head on each mule which they bring in from other States for feeding purposes and then when the mule is ready for shipment to be required to pay another $25 or $30 for the privilege of shipping and selling in another State? This forcibly illustrates the truth and correctness of the Democratic theory and policy of government which stands for larger trade and commercial peace and facilities, believing that there is profit both in buying and selling and that the prosperity of the country will be best promoted to all the people when there are few shackles upon trade and artificial conditions are destroyed, and competition and sale and purchase shall be afforded to all the people. I wish to say again that, in my opinion, which is reenforced and supported by the almost unanimous opinion of the Democrats in Congress, that the legislation which we propose will be of immense benefit to the farmers of the country, and I am confident that it will not injure the farmers of our section.

"In your letter you refer to the fact that there has been lately a decline in the price of farm products, and you charge it to the discussion of Canadian reciprocity. It is only necessary to call your attention to the fact that for time out of mind prices have risen and fallen. I might call your attention to the fact that on June 10, 1909, wheat was $1.51; August 26, $1.06; October 14, $1.27;, October 21, $1.21; January 13, 1910, $1.33; June 16, $1.033; November 10, 96 cents. I could call your attention to the same fluctuations in the prices of corn, oats, and other products, showing greater fluctuations, and that Canadian reciprocity has nothing whatever to do with it.

"I may add that the caucus adopted and the House proposes to pass a companion bill placing on the free list all farm and agricultural implements and machinery and vehicles of every kind, leather, saddles and harness, boots and shoes, cotton bagging and ties, and many other articles which enter into the use and consumption of the farmers and the price of which is controlled more or less by the tariff; and I fail to see wherein the farmer has any cause of complaint at the program of legislation proposed by the Democratic Party.

"The doctrine of protection has been talked so long that its political poison has spread much throughout the country and artificial conditions of trade have been created, one artificial condition demanding the creation of another, and so on, until trade conditions have become so artificial and abnormal that trusts and combinations to control prices and restrain trade have infested the land; and the Democratic Party—true to the principles which it has always proclaimed with reference to the tariff—pledged itself to reduce the tariff, and should it not do so it would be false to its promises and betray the trust which the people reposed in it.

"After many years of difference and dispute and quarrels and defeat the Democrats finally united and won a glorious victory in the last congressional election. I believe in Democratic harmony and unity and cooperation. I deplore dissension and strife and division. Now is the time for unity of action and cooperation of purpose, and, all over the country, Democrats everywhere are demanding unity of action and that we shall subordinate our local and personal differences and stand united as a party. This I indorse, and such is my purpose."

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to say that I might have gone further into the details of our trade relations with Canada and reasons why I support this legislation, but it occurs to me that I have said enough to make my position plainly understood. Let the Government return to a rightful and proper use and exercise of the taxing power; let normal trade and commercial conditions be restored; let every man and every industry have a fair chance and unhampered opportunities in the struggles of life; let everyone receive and enjoy the full benefit of the results of his toil, industry, and capacity. Then will the country prosper and the blessings and benefits of labor and trade will be justly and more equitably distributed among the masses of the people and labor will receive and enjoy its reward. Discontent will largely disappear and happiness will bless the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators; thrashing machines, including windstackers, baggers, weighers, and self-feeders therefor and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following substitute. I wish to transfer from page 4 the amendment that I have sent to the Clerk's desk to line 4, on page 16. The paragraph that I offer the amendment to has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FORDNEY:

Pages 4 and 5, strike out the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 4, and ending with line 2, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in part, including repair parts."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. FORDNEY. I offer this as a substitute for the paragraph just read, and on that I would like to say a few words.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I do not know what the amendment is.

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers a substitute——

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentlemen will permit, I will explain to the committee what I mean by the substitute for that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will suspend for a moment. The Chair will undertake to state the amendment offered by him. It is in lieu of lines 21, 22, 23, and 24, on page 4, and lines 1 and 2, on page 5, to insert the amendment read from the Clerk's desk as a substitute, and as to which a point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, in support of the substitute I wish to say that I am offering it for the reason that by the transfer of that paragraph to page 16, line 4, after the word "namely," it places the farm machinery described in that paragraph, or substitute, upon the free list coming from Canada into the United States, without affecting the duty on that class of goods going from his country into Canada.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] stated a while ago that his objection to a certain amendment was because it was not reciprocal. I would call his attention to section 2 of the bill and ask him where there is a word in the entire section or bill that is reciprocal between this country and Canada. Section 2 provides for letting into our market free of duty all print paper and pulp without asking anything in return for it. On the other hand, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said he would vote against all amendments to the bill, and that he would vote for the measure. Now, I want to offset that vote by saying that I will vote for any amendment that will destroy it.

The gentleman from Illinois said that he believed that all articles were reciprocal, for the reason that we were trading a ton of iron ore for peanuts. That is about the size of the measure, gentlemen. This bill is just about the size of trading a ton of iron ore, representing one of the great industries of this country, for peanuts from North Carolina.

Mr. Chairman, we are taking away from the farmer every vestige of protection on every article produced by him. And no man on that side of the House or this side of the House will contend, if he is fair in his argument, that there is a single thing in the substitute which I have offered that will in any way jeopardize the success of this measure except, my friends, that you are not willing to trade the farmer something for something that you are taking away from him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman's amendment propose to increase the duty found in the bill under consideration at present?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say, is not the effect of the gentleman's amendment to increase the duty found in the pending bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. If that is the effect, then I do not understand anything that I am talking about. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But I will say to the gentleman that when I want to reach a conclusion in making up my own judgment I will not go to the gentleman from Brooklyn, or New York. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman would be much more fortunate if he did, rather than rely on himself and his own judgment. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. It is very fortunate for me, perhaps, that I am not a resident of Brooklyn. I have the honor to come from a better district—a district where Republicans grow, and where the farmers raise the products that feed the mouths of the people of Brooklyn. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. Brooklyn no longer exists. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but it is still on the map, and it belongs to the free-trade element. No man can come to Congress from the district represented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] who does not express the sentiment expressed by him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is right. They represent the will of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, well, if my friend wants anything good to eat he will come to Michigan, and there he will get it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the substitute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan shows how sincerely honest he is in trying to defeat this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I said. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Michigan not only offers an amendment to change the terms of the bill, and so defeat it, but he proposes to raise the duty on the articles mentioned beyond the rates of the reciprocity duty and put those articles back at the old Payne-bill rate, because in offering his amendment he strikes out all rate of duty, and necessarily, as no rate of duty is mentioned, the articles would fall again under the terms on the Payne bill, which are above the rates of duty fixed in this bill, and that would of necessity defeat this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to reply to that suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. By transferring this paragraph from the protected list to the free list, does the gentleman mean to say that it will increase the duty on that article?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman gives no duty, and that would follow necessarily therefrom.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read the language prior to that. Will the gentleman permit me? I would like to set myself right on this. On page 15, line 24, the bill says:

That the articles mentioned in the following paragraphs, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), shall be exempt from duty, namely:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the gentleman transfers it from the free list of this bill to the dutiable list.

Mr. FORDNEY. No. It is just the reverse. I transfer it from the dutiable list to the free list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is the protected list, and the gentleman transfers the item from that without naming any duty, and in consequence the present rate of duty fixed by the Payne law would be effective.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I beg to differ with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Laths, 10 cents per 1,000 pieces.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, no one in this House can accuse me of lack of good faith in offering this amendment. No one can accuse me of offering this amendment for the purpose of defeating this bill. I voted for the bill before, and whether my amendment carries or not, I will vote for it again. [Applause.] I am offering the amendment in the interest of the people, not alone of my district, but of the entire country; because you have admitted upon the other side that if the amendment does not prevail now it will not be written into the law of this country during this session of Congress. This is your one opportunity to give our people absolute free lumber from Canada, and the question is whether or not you will embrace it. This bill goes far toward free trade in lumber with Canada, but it ought to go all the way.

I am one of the few gentlemen on this side who come from the Middle West who have been earnestly insisting upon a revision downward of the tariff law of this country who are now standing consistently for the same thing in this Congress that they stood for in the Sixty-first Congress.

There is a declaration made in the report of the minority on this bill, filed in the last Congress, signed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], that this bill is an abandonment of the policy of protection. I am not in favor of the abandonment of the policy of protection as William McKinley defined it, as William H. Taft and other great leaders of my party define it, that it is the application of a duty equal to the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad, but I am in favor of abandoning protection as defined by Mr. DALZELL and Mr. FORDNEY, and I will not join with them in maintaining their kind of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am sorry that I must differ with my friends from the Middle West, but in my judgment the consistent thing for us to do is not to rally round these gentlemen whose brand of protection we were so recently repudiating, but that instead we should stand with the President of the United States in this matter; because he is right and I am sure no Republican President ever did, and no Republican President ever will propose a measure to the Congress of the United States that is an abandonment of the policy of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. MADISON. No; I have only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADISON. Illness prevented me from being here and discussing this bill as I wished and showing as best I could that this bill would not, as has been represented, be detrimental but beneficial to the agricultural classes of the Middle West. I have only five minutes now to discuss my amendment, and can not yield for interruptions. You gentlemen on the other side admit that your so-called "farmers' free-list" bill is not to become a law. You say it will be defeated in the Senate. Why are you passing it? In order that it may go to the Senate and be defeated—in order that you may cry that it was defeated by a Republican Senate? That is playing politics. That is not rising to the high standard to which you as a responsible party ought to rise, and when you are offered the opportunity to give the people of this country free lumber, as you can in this bill, and you refuse to do it, and pass through this House a bill including free lumber that you know will not pass the Senate, you are absolutely convicting yourselves in the eyes of the American people of the fault of inconsistency when you say you want to give them free lumber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADISON. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Regular order!

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama renews the request that the gentleman from Kansas may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADISON. My amendment is only the first of a number that I propose to offer. If you are honest in your desire for complete free lumber I feel sure you will vote this amendment through, and it will be the first one along the line of giving free lumber to the American people from Canada, a country that ranks third among the countries of the world in the quantity of its mature marketable timber.

Gentlemen, this bill is going to the other end of this Capitol, and the Senate of the United States will make the bill. As in the historic summer of 1909 this House will hurry through the bills it is now considering, send them to the Senate, and abdicate the responsibilities and duties placed upon it by the Constitution of the United States. The time will come when the representatives of the people of this country in this House will institute a contest to restore to the House the fundamental rights and privileges of the House. And I say, let it begin now and in the making of this bill. Let us assert our rights under the Constitution to originate bills to raise revenue, and let us make the bill as the gentlemen on the other side would make it, at least as to lumber, if they expressed their own desires. Why, nine out of every ten of you on the other side are in favor of free lumber, and yet you say your free-list bill will not go through, that this bill will go over to the Senate, and that the Senate will do with it as it pleases; and I say to you that, in all human probability, when it comes back here no man will recognize it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have a sincere regard for the gentleman from Kansas who has just taken his seat, but through some misapprehension or misconception he has made a statement that I must challenge. He states that we propose to pass a bill through this House with the statement that we do not recognize that it has a chance to become a law. I deny that proposition. I tell you, sir, that the free-list bill that we have introduced in this House and propose to pass will become a law [applause on the Democratic side] or the men who sit in the United States Senate on the Republican side will vacate many a seat, and the President of the United States, if he does not sign it, will never be heard of again in the political history of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MADISON. Was the gentleman in the House and did he hear the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but I thought the gentleman's statement was facetious.

Mr. MADISON. Never was the gentleman from New York more serious.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I will say to the gentleman that the bill puts on the free list agricultural implements, fencing wire, and salt and free lumber for your northern farmers. It puts on the free list free cotton bagging and free hides for the southern farmer. It puts on the free list free meat, free bread, and free salt for the people who live in the cities and who are crying for cheaper food products to reduce the cost of living. I say to you that when that bill arrives in the United States Senate if it is not acted upon, there will be a judgment day in the Republican side of the Senate, and if the President does not sign it, there will be a judgment day at the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says that the farmers' free-list bill puts salt on the free list for the northern farmer. I live in a northern State and I can purchase a ton of salt for 75 cents in my home city.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not controvert the statement I made.

Mr. FORDNEY. A ton of salt will last you 100 years. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman probably lives near a salt mine.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman spoke of a judgment day. I want to ask if that side is not a little more anxious for a judgment day than it is for legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; if there has been a Congress that has met in two decades that has shown itself willing to pass remedial legislation, not partisan legislation but remedial legislation in the interest of the people, this Congress has done so. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman has just said that he is desirous to pass remedial legislation and one of the items is free salt. I agree with him that that is proper, but is that other great necessity, sugar, on the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If not, why not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When we get to the sugar schedule we will legislate as to that matter, but it carries $60,000,000 revenue, or thereabouts, and we can not abandon $60,000,000 to run the Government until we provide something to take its place. [Applause.]

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. Gentlemen of the House, I do not desire to unnecessarily weary you. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on that side of the House will not be so tumultuous as they are now when they are put up against a proposition of voting on the real merits of the questions which are here before us to-day. Having occupied no time in general debate and being in favor of the amendment which my colleague says he intends to offer on the subject of lumber, I want to avail myself of a few minutes to express my views on the amendments to this bill.

Gentlemen of the House, I desire to assure you, and I hope you will believe me in that much, that I do so with the same good faith which has been expressed by my colleague. I believe that if you would avail yourself of your constitutional rights to write this bill here, you would write a bill which would give justice to every American citizen under the flag, and which would give due credit to President Taft and his administration for negotiating this pact, which would preserve every jot and tittle of it as it was negotiated and would at the same time write into the policy of our Nation true reciprocity with our neighbor upon the north, and extend northward from the Gulf of Mexico to the frozen zones of the Hudson the great zollverein of American trade which now exists in the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, you can not mention reciprocity with Canada in that part of this country west of the Allegheny Mountains unless you bring to mind immediately two things, and they are free lumber and free wheat. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, by insisting on this bill without amendment, give us free wheat but deny us free lumber. They say to us that they propose to put lumber on the free list, but in the same breath tell us they do not believe that bill will become a law. In other words, gentlemen, you say to us you have the courage to assail "the best tariff law ever made"—I believe I quote correctly—in the House of its patron saint and defender and expect to succeed. Not only that, but I doubt whether you will find Brutuses enough, Democratic Brutuses, who will be willing to stab their Cæsar in the halls of the Senate. These are things upon which you will be doubted by the American people, and I say to you that if you are in favor now of free lumber and giving the western farmer a square deal you will vote for the propositions advocated by my colleague from Kansas [Mr. MADISON].

We are urged to vote for reciprocal relations with Canada on the grounds that our neighbors on the north are of the same blood, live under the same system of laws, and have the same industrial and commercial customs we have; but, sir, there can be but one reciprocity, founded on justice between two such peoples, and that is the reciprocity of free trade between those peoples. I am ready to vote for that. But even then it would be necessary to have a readjustment of other rates, tariff rates with which Canada has no concern, in order to do justice to farmers and others who have built up their businesses under the promise of the present tariff duties.

I am one of those who believe the danger which will come to the farmer under this bill has been greatly exaggerated, but this much must be admitted: The new policy, if adopted, means a readjustment of prices and investments, and consequent losses for the farmer. What do you offer as a compensation for these losses? No reduction in the tariff of any consequence from the same country on the things he buys, and free competition with a farmer living under the preferential tariffs granted by England to Canada.

In order to give you a Canadian view of the concessions made by this bill to the farmers on our side of the line, I desire to read a paragraph from Albert R. Carmen, a noted writer, of Montreal, in the National Review of last month. He says, speaking of the Canadian commissioners:

> They were life-long leaders of the "school" which held tenaciously that some sort of a reciprocity between Canada and the United States ought to be possible and profitable without political menace. One of the first doctrines of this "school" has always been that we should strive to get free access for our farm products into the American market, and a companion for this has always been that we should get "free fish" for "free fishing." For the aforesaid free trade in farm products this "school" has usually been willing to grant some concessions on manufactured goods. With these points in their minds our ministers went to Washington; they were offered free trade in farm products without any concessions to speak of on manufactured goods and "free fish" without "free fishing."
> We can imagine them—with their eyes solely on the business side of the subject—hardly able to believe their own good fortune.

The duties which these gentlemen insist shall follow the so-called Canadian pact give the American farmer only the same relief which the Canadian commissioners gave to us; they insist that they shall be the same; they amount to nothing to speak of.

If the Senate amends the bill, as I fully expect it to do, giving the West some measure of compensation for what you take away by this bill, or if you will write into it Mr. MADISON'S amendments and treat the Lumber Trust, the Steel Trust, and Harvester Trust as you treat the American farmer, I will vote for the bill, but I will not vote to take all away from the farmer and to take none of the high protective duties away from the trusts.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to elaborate upon this question. To my mind, Members of this House have been so thorough in their investigation and so lucid in their expositions that, after having listened with attention to the debate, I find myself restricted to very narrow limits, lest I annoy you with useless repetition.

Among other things that have impressed me is the nonpartisan manner of the debate, which demonstrates that the gentlemen here present are true to the trust imposed in them by their constituents, that they have the promotion of the best interests of the Nation as a whole at heart, and are here to enact legislation that will prove in their judgment the greatest good to the greatest number. However, it is only natural that some should differ in their conclusions regarding this measure, as it has a peculiar bearing upon the industries of every State of the Nation. Therefore, after weighing the merits of this bill, by which it must necessarily rise or fall, I have, after due study, taken the liberty to anticipate its probable effect upon the Nation at large and inevitably came to the conclusion that the enactment of reciprocity with Canada will prove of inestimable good and benefit.

An argument advanced by those who are opposed, and one upon which they have laid much pressure, may be stated briefly in this manner: That the barrier between Canada and the United States withdrawn, the large yield and extensive production of wheat in western Canada would prove a very formidable competitor with the production of wheat in the United States. Now, if I understand the arguments of the gentlemen from Minnesota correctly, they have maintained that the price of grain at Minneapolis is usually higher than the market prices of the world, transportation charges being considered. Now, usually there is a reason, and when we examine this proposition we find there is a very satisfactory explanation underlying this condition.

Ex-Gov. Lind, of Minnesota, while a Member of this House from that State, who has rendered great service to his State and to the Nation by his usefulness and statesmanship, speaking on tariff revision and Canadian reciprocity, stated on this floor, December 14, 1903, that:

> I speak to my colleagues from the Northwest with full assurance that they will not deny the statement that the one factor that has contributed the most to make Minneapolis great is the development of her milling industries—through the development of that magnificent industry, the greatest in the world, and through the energy and foresight of our earlier business men, Charles Pillsbury and others, living and dead.
> Minneapolis has become the greatest primary wheat market in the world. It makes every bushel of wheat raised in Minnesota and the Dakotas worth 2 to 6 cents a bushel more than it would be if our section were dependent upon Chicago or any other eastern point. Some of us know what has made Milwaukee famous. [Laughter.] All of us know what has made Minneapolis famous—"Pillsbury's Best." To maintain the standard of that magnificent bread and of all of our flour our mills must have a certain proportion of hard wheat; and, let me tell you confidentially, that wheat raised in Iowa and southern Minnesota and South Dakota is deteriorating somewhat from year to year, both in quantity and quality.
> What has made Minneapolis flour great? What has given it a world-wide market? Is it not its superior quality and the faithful maintenance of that quality? But to maintain that standard we must have the stronger wheat, that wheat rich in gluten, which comes now only from the prairies of the Dakotas and from the northern part of our State, and in decreasing amount, but which we must obtain from Manitoba and from the other Canadian Provinces in the future.
> If for possible present temporary gain you think that our millers should be prohibited from maintaining the quality of their goods and maintaining their world-wide market, where will your farmer neighbors and mine land when "Pillsbury's Best" has ceased to stand for what it now stands? You know, as I know, that our local wheat commands the price that it does only because our mills can as yet obtain enough of the stronger northern wheat to mix with it.

From this it may be inferred that the gentlemen from Minnesota who oppose this bill by reading the speech of the great son of Minnesota would be enlightened regarding the causes which produce the above-mentioned effect. In my own city of Omaha we have been laboring earnestly for several years and have established a great grain market. We have also gone into the milling business. Our winter wheat of Nebraska is rich and splendid in quality, and a large amount is shipped annually to Minneapolis to be mixed with the hard wheats of that vicinity in order that it may be made into a superior selling grade of white flour.

In the daily press of my city this week an important news item states that a large railroad project, on account of the belief that reciprocity with Canada will be enacted, with ample capital, has been formed to construct a railway north and south through Nebraska, the Dakotas, and into Canada. With the completion of this proposed railway the farmers of Nebraska will be enabled to have shipped in from Canada the hard wheats, and thus the milling industries of Nebraska and the Middle West will be benefited and save the producers the necessity of paying the freight charge to the railroads to carry their wheat to Minneapolis, and instead of our farmers paying the freight the Canadians will ship to our mills and pay the freight.

It has been stated here that the prices for wheat are fixed in Liverpool. This is substantially true. However, to be accurate, it must be stated that this rule is subject to the convenience of grain gambling kings of the great cities who drive the prices up and down to suit their purposes. But it is a fact that the price of wheat is fixed by the world's supply. Every day there is quoted in the grain markets the production or supply of wheat in the Argentine Republic, the supply in Europe, and the Black Sea ports. Therefore excepting in so far as local milling conditions in Minneapolis may have an effect locally the export supply of every wheat-producing nation is ruled by the demand at Liverpool.

At South Omaha, Nebr., there exists the third largest stock market in the world. The cattle feeders of Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, and adjoining States come to Omaha to purchase young cattle for their pastures and feed lots. With the barriers between the United States and Canada removed and the anticipated development of the railroad facilities, Canada will ship to our markets in the United States her stock—cattle and feeders—which will be bought by the cattle feeders of the corn-growing States and fattened for food purposes.

Considerable emphasis has been laid on the importations of sheep. The corn-growing States of the Middle West can feed and fatten all the sheep Canada can raise without injuring the cattle-raising industry of the country. Especially so when we know that the total number of sheep imported by Canada in 1909 was only 103,000, while at the South Omaha market as high as 67,000 have been marketed in a single day. This fact establishes to a certainty that the importation of sheep from Canada will not prove disastrous.

Some gentlemen have expressed concern over the effect this bill will have on flax production. As a young man in central and northern Iowa I observed that flax was usually sown on virgin soil; that is, on land just broken by the plow. This was because the roots of the flax rotted the soil and made it fit for wheat the following year. But after the soil became sufficiently adapted no more flax was sown, as it was too severe on the soil. For the same reason, in the developed regions of the Dakotas, flax seeding was used to great advantage, and it is now used in western Canada for the preparation of similar soils for farming purposes. Therefore, reciprocity with Canada will prove beneficial on account of the small amount of flax raised and the great amount needed in the United States.

The illustrious gentleman from Illinois pointed out on the map of Canada in his inimitable way the direction of the heat waves meandering around the southern edges of Hudson Bay and Mackenzie Basin. It seems that he evidently forgot to mention the cold waves that get busy in the neighborhood of Medicine Hat and Swift Current, in the wheat regions of Canada. Why, Mr. Chairman, in Nebraska when we look at the Government weather reports and see that the cold waves commence to do business at Medicine Hat we take it as a signal to drive our cattle and sheep to shelter and prepare ourselves for the coming ordeal. Medicine Hat is reputed as the most likely place from which a cold wave is likely to emanate, and when my friends from the Dakotas who oppose this bill hear that Medicine Hat has begun its deadly frost-biting work they hibernate or seek shelter, and often we do not hear from them for weeks.

Another thing that strikes me as being a principle of equity and justice is that we should be fair to our friends, our neighbors, and our relatives who have, with the courage characteristic of our people, crossed over into Canada to develop that country. And, Mr. Chairman, why should we not lend a helping hand to these large numbers of our brothers by means of this reciprocity with Canada, which without doubt will prove very serviceable in securing their permanent success and prosperity?

In conclusion, I wish to state that I have heard considerable about the effect the passage of this bill would have on different districts. Let me say that I represent one of the greatest manufacturing and agricultural districts of the Middle West, a district in which the cities of Omaha and South Omaha are located, whose census in 1910 totaled 124,096 and 26,000 people, respectively. Since coming to Washington I have not received a single protest from my district against this bill. Not a manufacturer, jobber, or farmer has requested me to vote against it. To show you that my district, which is inhabited by an intelligent and enterprising people, has sufficient manufacturing, agriculture, and so forth, to be interested, and to protest if they so desired, I will quote you a few statistics:

Omaha during 1910 sold $132,262,000 worth of merchandise. The manufacturing products of Omaha and South Omaha amounted to $200,968,541. Our bank clearings were $842,000,000; real estate transfers, $15,273,455; our live stock receipts were 6,132,451, divided into 1,223,533 head of cattle, 1,894,314 hogs, 2,984,870 sheep, and 29,734 horses and mules. In South Omaha we packed 3,746,454 head of live stock, comprising 798,950 cattle, 1,656,246 hogs, and 1,291,258 sheep.

The grain receipts of Omaha were 43,607,400 bushels, representing 9,212,400 bushels of wheat, 23,494,200 bushels of corn, and 10,023,600 bushels of oats.

We also have at Omaha one of the greatest butter markets in the world.

These figures show that with reciprocity with Canada and the proper railroad facilities there is a strong possibility for still greater development of the resources throughout the Middle West. It is only right and just that we should send our surplus products into Canada and receive in exchange commodities which we can use to good advantage. Thus the Great West will become an empire of richness whose greatness can not be estimated.

The farming lands in my district, with these developments, are as fair and as productive as any under the sun. Our schools are of the best. My people are intelligent and are fully able to understand the value of reciprocal trade with their brethren who have gone to Canada to develop that country, and so at the close of this great debate, which has so fully covered all lines of thought, I do not agree, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Kansas that this is the proper time to place into the treaty any amendments, for reasons fully stated by the friends of the treaty. I am in favor of reciprocity, and I am in favor of this bill, but I am not in favor of defeating it by adding on any amendments here to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer one word that strikes particularly at the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON]. He moves to strike out line 24, which is a provision of 10 cents per thousand on lath. Now, with that section stricken out the old Payne tariff rate attaches of 20 cents a thousand, so the gentleman's amendment is not worth consideration for even a moment.

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield. If the gentleman had moved to put lath on the free list, it might at least have been consistent, but as he offers to strike it out he accomplishes nothing and increases the rates from 10 cents, as provided in this pact, to 20 cents, as provided in the Payne bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen upon that side of the House seem to get all their consolation to-day from the misinterpretation of a statement made by me. The doubt as to whether the free-list bill would eventually become a law was not expressed or initiated by myself. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and other gentlemen on that side of the House offered amendments putting upon the free list certain commodities, the products of the Dominion of Canada, because, they assured this side of the House, in that way alone could such articles be placed upon the free list. In the confidence, as they have been in the past and are now, of those directing the Republican Party, both in this House and in another House, they seem to have positive information that a free-list bill can not pass the present Republican Senate. When these gentlemen asked me if, in my opinion, the free-list bill was likely to pass and become a law, in view of the record of the Republican Party and in the face of the statements and the assertions made upon that side of the House, I expressed a doubt, and I said to them that unless some supernatural agency intervened it was very doubtful if the Republican Senate would within the very near future act in any way for the relief of the people or the country.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. However the gentleman arrived at the opinion, whether it comes from this side of the House or not, would not the gentleman advise his side of the House to clinch it by putting it in this bill which is likely to become a law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all; the gentleman and myself are in hearty agreement. We know that those who are proposing such amendments are not friends of the bill, but those who desire its defeat. Let me read from the controversy indulged in between the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and myself:

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would say to the gentleman, Yes, I will vote for that bill—

Referring to the free-list bill—

but the gentleman may rest assured that it will not pass.

And in view of the assertion made by the gentleman from South Dakota and his well-known and generally expressed views in favor of high-tariff rates, I could not withhold an expression of opinion that even at this time another branch of this Legislature had not awakened to the rising indignation of the American people, and that it would perhaps take another storm, the cleaning out of some other places, before the relief demanded by the people would be obtained from the Congress. Whatever lack of legislation there may be here in the interest of the people will not be due to the Democratic Party or to a Democratic House; it will rest upon the Republican Party and that body which is now controlled by a Republican majority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment. [Cries of "Regular order!"] The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MADISON) there were—ayes 48, noes 140.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shingles, 30 cents per 1,000.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of enunciating this proposition. Frequent and unwarranted reference is being made to the position of this side of the House. No matter what might be the opinion of the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman on this side, except the majority leader, his expression of opinion is only an expression for himself individually and does not in itself represent the position and attitude of this side. When this side wishes to express an opinion it will do so through the gentleman from Alabama, the majority leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment——

Mr. MANN. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk has no right to read so that nobody can hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was endeavoring to obtain order.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk should cease reading while the Chair is endeavoring to obtain order.

The CHAIRMAN. Order in the committee depends not so much upon the efforts of the Chair as upon the efforts of members of the committee. The Chair is endeavoring to obtain and keep order.

Mr. MANN. We are not criticizing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will not read during disorder.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MALBY. For the purpose of making an inquiry with reference to what the Clerk has just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MALBY. The gentleman from Alabama has stated that we are not to be directed by what the gentleman from New York has said, but the gentleman from Alabama—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. MALBY. Well, the Chair can not determine whether I am in order until I have made my inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. MALBY. I move to strike out the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, strike out line 25.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I am not so particular how it may read here as how it will read to the country. The gentleman from Alabama suggests we are not following the lead of my colleague from New York, but of his colleague from Alabama.

I am not so particular as to whom we are to follow as to ascertain exactly what we are to follow. I would like to have my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] state——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. MALBY. Not yet. I would like to make an inquiry.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. MALBY. I always proceed in order if I get a chance to proceed. In order that the House may know and that the country may know the position of the majority in Congress——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

Mr. MALBY (continuing). I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in reference to this particular paragraph and amendments I proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment. Under the rules pertaining to debate under the five-minute rule debate must be confined to the amendment or proposition before the committee. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MALBY. I understand that. I am trying to do that, but my friend from Florida [Mr. CLARK] does not seem willing to have me proceed. I was simply trying to ascertain from the authoritative leader of the House of Representatives——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I must insist that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MALBY. Not until I have completed my interrogatory.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman please state his amendment?

Mr. MALBY. The Clerk will report it again if there is any question about it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I would like a little further time. I suppose this is not being taken out of my time. Now that we have the policy of the House of Representatives fairly well understood, I would like to inquire specifically of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] whether or not the Democratic Party is in favor of placing lumber on the free list. I would just like an answer to that inquiry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the Democratic Party more than two years ago announced its position on that question in its platform, and the Members of Congress representing the Democratic Party are trying to carry out the platform. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, that is hardly a specific answer to my inquiry. I want to know——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is the best anyone can do with that kind of inquiry.

Mr. MALBY. I want to know specifically, so that we may carry the answer home to the people of the United States who are not——

Mr. CLAYTON. Just swear the witness. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALBY (continuing). In favor of free lumber. I want the Democratic Party through their authority, through the gentleman who represents them on the floor of this House, to state specifically whether they are in favor of free lumber or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman, in order that I may save time, that we have introduced a bill putting lumber on the free list. I am for it, and I am sure this side of the House is for it, and we expect to pass it within the next few days or weeks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MALBY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that fairly answers my question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will present the gentleman with a copy of the bill if he has not seen it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MALBY. Oh, I have seen the bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am very much pleased, indeed, to receive from such authoritative source the fact that our friends on the other side are in favor of free lumber.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Clerk has not been taking out of my time all of this loose talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair timed the gentleman, and the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for a couple of minutes more.

Mr. ADAIR. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that the Clerk read line 25. Is not that true?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read line 25.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 25. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman from New York just made that motion to strike out line 25.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understood the motion of the gentleman from New York, it was to strike out the last two words just read. If so, the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] is in order.

Mr. MADISON. I desire to move to strike out the paragraph, but do not desire to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. I do, Mr. Chairman. I desire to be heard in opposition, simply for the purpose of putting these lumber experts straight. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I understand these gentlemen from Kansas are making these motions because they stand for free lumber. I understand also that the gentleman from New York made his motion because he stands for free lumber.

Mr. MALBY. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. He made his motion because he is opposed to it. It seems they are making these motions for opposite reasons. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. They make these motions because they do not know anything about the tariff on lumber. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I want to explain the matter to them, so that they can square themselves with their constituents.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill laths are taxed 20 cents per thousand pieces. Under this bill laths are taxed only 10 cents per thousand pieces. And yet a while ago a gentleman from Kansas got up on the floor and moved to strike out line 24, and if he had succeeded in his motion he would have doubled the tariff on laths and would have restored the 20 per cent rate.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield. The pending motion, for which the gentleman from Kansas also stands, is to strike out line 25. Under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill shingles were taxed 50 cents per thousand. Under this paragraph, which the gentleman proposes to strike out, they are taxed 30 cents per thousand, so that if the motion which the gentleman stands for prevails he would put back the Dingley rate, 50 cents per thousand, which is 20 cents more than they now are.

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, it seems the gentleman did not do me the kindness to listen to my remarks. Everybody else in the House understood what I said distinctly, which was that this is but one of a number of motions which I propose to make leading to the putting of lumber of every kind on the free list, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is proceeding in the opposite direction, and when he makes these motions he is increasing, if his motions prevail, the tariff on lumber.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not understand, as I think the House does, that the gentleman from Kansas had in view the striking out of this paragraph here, and when we came to the free list putting it in there?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know what the gentleman had in view.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us be consistent. If we want to get free lumber, let us strike out the duty where the duty is prescribed, and put it in the free list.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman's time expired? If so, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MADISON. I want to say this, that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] understood me clearly, and I want the House to understand me. I have this amendment already prepared and will offer it in due time when it is in order:

After the word "wharves," in line 25, page 17, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the words "shingles, laths, fence posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

That is, put on the free list all the lumber that Canada produces. I tried to make myself clear to the House. Of course in order to get all classes and kinds of lumber from Canada on the free list it was necessary to strike out those paragraphs and then offer the amendment I have just read. I propose to offer it, but I shall have nothing further to say on this subject. It has been pretty well discussed, and I do not desire to take up the time of the House. We all understand the situation. The bill as it stands admits rough lumber free and materially reduces the duty on manufactured lumber. That is a great deal, but I would make it absolutely free.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest this to the gentleman, in view of the impossibility of amending this bill, which he himself will admit, which I believe he did admit a while ago——

Mr. MADISON. Oh, I did not.

Mr. RAINEY. If he should succeed in carrying these amendments and then fail to get his free-list amendment in when we get to that, what position will the gentleman then occupy? He will have increased the tariff 100 per cent over the amount which this bill now proposes.

Mr. MADISON. I did not admit for one moment that this bill could not be amended.

Mr. RAINEY. I thought the gentleman had found out by this time that it can not be amended.

Mr. MADISON. I said that this House ought to amend it, and that in all probability it will be amended in important particulars in another body.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MADISON. Yes; if my time has not expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is improbable that the Senate would pass the proposed free list, does not the gentleman think it would be equally unlikely that the Senate would pass this bill if articles on the proposed free list were incorporated in it?

Mr. MADISON. I do not know. I know that when the opportunity is presented to me to do my duty, I ought to do it without regard to what other men may do about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what we are going to do with the free list.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That is what we are going to do.

Mr. MADISON. That is the privilege of the gentlemen. I have no quarrel with them as to what they are about to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move, on page 7, line 25, to strike out "30 cents" and insert "1 cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 25, strike out "30 cents" and insert in lieu thereof "1 cent."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, considerable has been said back and forth here about what is going to happen to this bill and to the so-called free-list bill after they get through this House. I do not pretend to know what will happen to either one; but every man here knows, from what has been said, that there is considerable doubt about the free-list bill becoming a law. That doubt has been expressed on both sides. It is generally conceded that this so-called reciprocity bill will become a law. Now, if we do not want to play politics, if we want to get results, then let us put onto the bill that everybody knows will become a law the legislation that we want.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. If we put that on, will the bill become a law?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment will become a law if the bill becomes a law.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the question. Will it become a law?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the gentleman doubt that this bill will become a law?

Mr. CLAYTON. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody doubts it.

Mr. GARRETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the gentleman doubt that this bill will become a law?

Mr. GARRETT. I think it will if it is not amended.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman wants free lumber. Let us give it on this bill.

Mr. GARRETT. But if we put it into this bill, does the gentleman think this bill will become a law?

Mr. NORRIS. Why, yes. I do not see why it will not become a law if we pass it, for then it will be in the bill, and the bill will become a law.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Nebraska is one of the keenest men in this House. Does he not know that an amendment to the bill will defeat the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. On the other hand, I do not believe any such proposition. In view of the high intelligence and wisdom of the gentlemen who have made that statement here, I can not understand why they should make a statement of that kind.

The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Oklahoma, speaking against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, said that it would increase the rates. I think we understand what the parliamentary procedure would have been had the gentleman's motion prevailed, and had it carried we would have put lumber on the free list. If we pass this amendment I have offered, or in the consideration of it the arguments made by these gentlemen against it do not prevail, it will reduce the tariff on lumber from the country that we want to get it reduced from, practically the only country on earth that would do us any good to get free lumber from.

Now, then, if reducing duty on shingles from the Payne bill to the amount named in this bill—from 50 cents to 30 cents—is good, and we want free lumber and free shingles, let us reduce it from 30 cents to 1 cent. [Applause.] If you want free lumber, for God's sake vote for it instead of trying to make political capital out of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken the time of the House during this debate, and therefore I ask your indulgence for five minutes. The Democratic Party does not present this bill as its ideal of tariff legislation. It is by no means all that we desire. We present it, though, on account of the political situation in the country, the House being Democratic and the Senate being of the opposite political complexion, and with a Republican President.

If we were playing politics, as some gentlemen have suggested during the progress of this debate that we were, we would present our tariff measure complete and as a whole and let the Republican Senate and President turn it down, so as to bring upon those branches of the Government the same just condemnation of the public that has already been visited upon this branch, which has made so many absent seats on the Republican side of this Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are giving the people of the United States a half loaf, which is better than none. We are giving them now, so far as we have the power to give them anything, something that can pass both branches of this Legislature and be approved by the President of the United States.

We can not shut our eyes to the fact that there is violent opposition, not only on this floor but at the opposite end of the Capitol, not only in this country but in another country that is affected by this reciprocal agreement, to its passage. Some gentlemen have raised the question that the President had acted beyond his power in this matter. We say in answer to that that it is not a question of power, but a question of policy that is involved in this matter. No man on this side contends that the President of the United States has the power to attempt to originate tariff legislation, and no man on that side or on this side can truthfully say that he has attempted to do it in this case. He has simply suggested to the Congress of the United States that he has been able to secure an agreement with certain executive authorities of the Dominion of Canada by which the parties have agreed to recommend to the legislative branches of both Governments laws to carry out this agreement for reciprocal reduction of tariff duties between the two countries.

If the House passes this bill it will be legislating on its own initiative and in accordance with its own will entirely. So that when the Democratic majority in this Chamber stands by the President in this matter, when we say we will take this proposition as it comes to us from him unamended, we will take this agreement for lower tariff duties as recommended by the executive departments of both countries, we also say we will not load it down with amendments, in this Chamber at least, where we have both the power and the responsibility. We will not give to the Republican Senate an excuse to kill it; we will not give to the opposition party in the Dominion of Canada a pretext to slay it. Therefore, although this legislation is not perfect, although we favor free lumber and many more tariff reductions that can not be carried in this bill, which is intended to carry out a reciprocal agreement already negotiated, yet we will give the people of the United States a chance to get at least these tariff reductions on Canadian products, if it can be accomplished during the present session of Congress, without delay, and we will not play politics with it and load it down with amendments that might give its enemies at the other end of this Capitol an opportunity as well as an excuse to kill it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. NORRIS) there were—ayes 46, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, planed or finished on one side, 50 cents per 1,000 feet, board measure; planed or finished on one side and tongued and grooved, or planed or finished on two sides, 75 cents per 1,000 feet, board measure; planed or finished on three sides, or planed and finished on two sides and tongued and grooved, $1.12½ per 1,000 feet, board measure; planed and finished on four sides, $1.50 per 1,000 feet, board measure; and in estimating board measure under this schedule no deduction shall be made on board measure on account of planing, tonguing, and grooving.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, strike out lines 1 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further remarks to make about the matter. I have no desire to delay the House. There has been full expression of opinion in respect to it, and so far as I am concerned I have no further discussion to make.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing this amendment, because of the avowed purpose of its author to ultimately move to place lumber upon the free list. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] stated that we want lumber upon the free list. I do not know to whom he referred when he said "we."

Mr. NORRIS. I did not refer to the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope not, but I beg to inform the gentleman that there are a great many on this side of the House——

Mr. NORRIS. And a great many on the other side, too.

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). Who are protection Republicans, and who do not want lumber on the free list; and I want to say that I am reliably informed that there are a good many gentlemen upon the other side of the House, too, who do not want lumber upon the free list. [Applause.] I believe that if gentlemen voted untrammeled, voted their real sentiments—the way they actually feel about it—on that side as well as upon this side of the House, there would not be the ghost of a chance of this reciprocity treaty passing the House of Representatives. I claim the same right to stand for the local interests of my district as gentlemen on that side do for the local interests of theirs.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Not now. The wishes of the people interested in the lumber industry in the mountains of Kentucky appeal to me just as much as do the wishes of those interested in the mica or peanut industries in North Carolina or the fish industry in Massachusetts or in any other industry in any other section of the country that may be affected by this measure. I come from what is generally considered a Democratic district. Three times I have been elected on a platform favoring protection to lumber. I am glad to have the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] state here to the House and to the country that the Democratic Party stands for free lumber now. A good many who opposed me for Congress contended that the Democratic Party did not and would not. I was elected two years ago over a gentleman nominated by the Democratic Party who announced that he was not only in favor of protection to lumber, but that he was in favor of doubling the Republican rate of protection upon it, and the rate then was higher than it is now—the Dingley rate being then in force.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, you ought to have defeated that kind of a man.

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I thought so, too, although he was not as bad as some of you are on this tariff question.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). And if all of the people in my district had believed what the gentleman from Alabama stated awhile ago, my majority last fall, notwithstanding the Democratic landslide over the country, would have been 4,000 instead of 2,000, as it was.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield to gentlemen on either side of the House. I do not want to be discourteous to anybody, and especially to my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from New Jersey, but I have not the time. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that he wants to help me by asking me a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He did not have anything on me. I wanted to do the same thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly obliged to my friend from New Jersey, who is always courteous to this side of the House, and also to my friend from Massachusetts, who seems to desire to help me, but I do not feel that I need any help. [Laughter.] The people of my district have commissioned me, Mr. Chairman, to vote against any proposition looking to the placing of lumber upon the free list, and I propose to carry out their commission and cast my vote accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, the prosperity of the lumber industry involves a living for many a poor man and his family in my district, and I know that it means the same thing in many other States of this Union. It is the second or third greatest industry in the United States, involving millions and millions of dollars and the wages of thousands and thousands of men. If free lumber from Canada will depress the lumber industry, as I believe it will, then I am opposed to it; if it will not have that effect, then it will not help or hurt anybody, and the only result will be the presentation to Canada of that much revenue which would otherwise go into the Treasury of the United States to help bear the expenses of our Government; and all foreigners look alike to me when it comes to injuring our home markets by letting foreign products in. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coal, bituminous, round and run of mine, including bituminous coal such as will not pass through a three-quarter inch screen, 45 cents per ton.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Because of the great demand for time on the Republican side of the House, I failed to secure an opportunity to discuss this measure during the general debate; and I shall not attempt any general discussion of the measure now under the five-minute rule. But I feel that it is due myself and due the farmers of my district that I repudiate the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]. In closing the general debate in behalf of those Republicans who favor the measure he strongly intimated his belief that the farmers of the country, in opposing reciprocity with Canada, were not acting in good faith, were not expressing their own convictions, but were being made the cat's-paw by the big interests. I hold no brief for the farmers of the country at large; but I can speak for the farmers of my district and for the farmers of Vermont. And so far as they are concerned, the insinuation of the gentleman from Massachusetts is slanderous in the extreme. The farmers of Vermont are opposed to reciprocity because of their conviction that it is an utterly unfair discrimination against them and against the farmers of the country as a class. Let me read to you a letter written on the 20th of last January, before the details of the provisions of the agreement were generally known. The writer is one of the progressive farmers of my district, and the letter voices the convictions of the farmers of Vermont:

ST. ALBANS, VT., January 30, 1911.

Hon. D. J. FOSTER, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FOSTER: I believe that portion of your constituents which is made up of the farmers of Vermont has a genuine cause for alarm in the prospect of the passage of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada, and I would like to give you my reasons for this belief.

I realize that in the just settlement of this tariff question there should be a patriotic consideration of the greatest good for the greatest number, but from the newspaper reports of this treaty we can see no just distribution of its burdens or its benefits. The Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says that the plan of the commission has been to select the commodities for reciprocity in such a way as to arouse the smallest amount of antagonism on either side of the border. I presume that it was in keeping with this policy that the articles which are on the proposed free list are, with the one exception of fish, made up of products of the farm. I am fully aware that the agricultural interests have the least effective business organization of any industry in the country, and for that reason they are the least prepared to offer effective resistance to any encroachment upon their rights, but we can at least appeal to the sense of justice of the President and Congress of the United States.

As farmers we would not greatly object to free trade with Canada or to a reciprocal agreement which would enable us to benefit by the lower cost of many things which, as consumers, we could purchase in Canada, because we realize that we would have little to fear from a free interchange of commodities with a people having a standard of living and economic resources similar to our own, but we maintain that a treaty like the one proposed, which throws the whole burden upon agriculture and gives no benefits in return, is manifestly unfair.

If the farmers of this country were unduly prosperous and were accumulating large fortunes, we could see some justice in such a course, but I maintain that such is not the case. We invite the fullest investigation into the profits in farming, even where it is conducted in the most careful and scientific manner, with the full knowledge that the profits, after deducting labor, interest, and other fixed charges, would be very small in comparison with the profits in the manufacturing industries which you are asked to favor by this treaty.

I ask you to consider the history of American agriculture for the past century. The inducements offered by the Federal Government for the rapid settlement of the new lands of the West, the invention of machinery to till these lands and to harvest the crops grown upon them, and the building of railroads to transport these crops to market all worked to cause a production of foodstuffs far in excess of the demand. A system of farming based upon soil robbery resulted, and much of the time farm products were produced at a loss if labor and depletion of soil fertility had been taken into account. Farmers became discouraged, boys who could get away left the farms, and the business was considered a good one to get out of. All this time, when the prices of our farm products were determined by the surplus sold in free-trade markets, we were allowed a high protective tariff on foodstuffs. In the past few years a change has taken place. Population has increased so that consumption has overtaken production and prices have increased so that the farmer is able to get a living wage for his work and some interest on his investment. We have passed from the soil-robbery stage of our agriculture to the higher stage, which requires trained men who see the need of maintaining the fertility of the soil.

The past 10 years of higher prices have witnessed the employment of more capital and better methods, and the farms have responded with a larger and surer production to meet the need of the increasing population, but the record so far but points the way to what the farms of this country may do by the employment of yet more capital and generally improved methods.

I maintain that our experiment stations and good farmers in every State have demonstrated that the producing power of our farms may be made several times what it is now and that we can take care of our population for centuries to come. Now, to satisfy the demand of consumers for cheaper food, it is proposed to place upon us the burden of competition with millions of acres of cheap virgin soil. Out of every dollar that the consumer now pays for food we get but 35 cents, the other 65 cents going for transportation and distribution, and this 35 cents is not now giving us more than a fair compensation for our work.

We ask you to consider if it is wise to interrupt the development of our own agricultural resources, which has now been so well begun, while once more the process of soil robbery and profitless agriculture is carried on in a foreign country. We farmers of Vermont have everything to lose and nothing to gain by this treaty, and we are expecting you to protect our interests.

With kindest regards to you in every way, I am,

Very truly, yours, E. L. BINGHAM.

My colleague Mr. PLUMLEY has handed me two letters addressed to him, one of the 25th and one of the 26th of last January, by one of the leading farmers in his district, showing that when the news of the reciprocity agreement with Canada reached the Vermont farmers they did not wait to hear from the "big interests," but promptly sent in their protest. Let me read these letters:

WATERBURY, VT., January 25, 1911.

Hon. FRANK PLUMLEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose clipping from yesterday's Boston Globe, which leads me to ask you if you are earnestly looking after the interests of the farmers of Vermont in connection with reciprocity with Canada.

This man GARDNER, and all other Massachusetts Representatives in Congress and such representatives outside of Congress, as the notorious Foss, are demanding an open market for Canadian farm products, but all their own interests must be protected. Not for 25 years, until within the last 3 or 4 years, have Vermont farm products returned the cost of production.

No one seems to know what kind of a trade the President has made with the representatives of Canada, but I suppose we shall know after to-morrow, and I hope and believe that you will not fail the Vermont farmer, for he is going to need your best efforts now and in the next Congress as never before.

Very respectfully, yours, GEORGE G. GRANT.

WATERBURY, VT., January 26, 1911.

Hon. FRANK PLUMLEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: These people are more sensitive in their pockets than in their stomachs where their own pockets are affected, but they will be just as insistent in their demand that they be fed at the expense of the Vermont farmer as they are in their demand for protection at the expense of all the people.

We do not ask for free fish; we are willing they should have all the protection they need. But we do ask for a square deal, and that we shall not be compelled to feed their mill hands on farm products that do not pay the cost of production that they may thereby hire those same mill hands at a lower wage.

Can you send me a copy of the present tariff law?

Respectfully, yours, GEORGE G. GRANT.

The farmers of Vermont do their own thinking. They carry their own convictions under their own hats. They know by reputation the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]. They recognize his ability, his scholarship, his high standing in Congress and out of Congress. But they could remind him that two years ago, when we were attempting to revise the tariff, he was one of a small coterie of "elder statesmen" that stood like a stone wall to prevent such a reasonable downward revision of the tariff as the people of the country had reason to expect at the hands of the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Live animals: Cattle, horses and mules, swine, sheep, lambs, and all other live animals.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 16, strike out the word "sheep," and, in line 6, the word "lambs."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, you will remember, it was contended on the floor of this Chamber that this bill put all the products of the farmer on the free list except wool. I want to call the attention of the Members of this House to the fact that it puts wool to a large extent on the free list. There is nothing to prevent sheepmen in Canada driving any number of sheep over the line before shearing time and after shearing drive them back again into Canada. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That is all right, gentlemen, you laugh, and you simply laugh because you do not understand the conditions.

A MEMBER. Tell us about them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to say that for 2,000 miles along the border sheep are run in bands from 1,000 to 5,000 head. There is nothing in the world to hinder the sheepman from running the sheep a hundred miles. He can drive down into the United States by slow stages to James Hill's railroad, shear them there, and take his time and drive them back again into Canada. You fellows laugh at this, but it is simply because you do not understand the conditions. That means the marketing of millions of pounds of wool from Canada that loses to the Government of the United States from 11 to 12 cents per pound duty. I simply wanted to call attention to this. You will not pay any attention to it, but the people of the United States will pay attention to it. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "cattle" in line 5, page 16, the following: "Except cattle fattened for slaughter."

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume the time of the House in discussing the merits of this amendment. I want to call attention, however, to this fact, that when the convention between the Governments of Canada and France but a few years ago was negotiated by the representatives of their respective countries, the Senate of France refused to concur in it unless an amendment such as this was first incorporated.

And Canada acceded to it. Here is a precedent that we can amend this treaty; here is a precedent, in substance, where Canada has acceded to a similar amendment by another country. And while I do not expect this amendment will prevail here to-day, in view of the caucus action of the majority of this House, I want the RECORD to show, and I want the issue to be clearly presented, whether the people of this country, through their Representatives in this House or through their other responsible officials, are less concerned in the protection of the farming interests of this country than was the Government of France for the farming interests of France. I want the RECORD to show whether you gentlemen upon that side of the Hall are less in sympathy with our farmers than were the representatives of the French people in their Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, on page 16, after the word "animals," insert the following: "Fresh meats: Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats; bacon and ham; meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner; canned meats; extract of meat; lard and compounds thereof; and tallow.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I think the record of this afternoon's proceedings should show that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] a short time ago made certain objections to placing these articles upon the free list he made one which was applauded upon the other side of the House, which was that to place these articles upon the free list in this bill would conflict with the favored-nation clause in our treaty. And yet, although they approved that sentiment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], they say that in three or four days they are going to pass a bill through this House placing these articles, all of them, upon the free list for the entire world. How do you reconcile that statement? Only in one way—that it is still your hope that that free-list bill that you propose will never become a law, and you are opposed to these amendments to this bill because you know if they are adopted in this bill they will become a law.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] a short time ago said this would mean the defeat of the bill, but gave no reasons for it. How will it mean the defeat of the bill? Where will it be defeated? In the Senate? The Senate will have an opportunity to amend it, striking these out, if they desire to do so. Will it be vetoed by the President? Remember that the President, in his message transmitting this agreement to Congress, stated that in his judgment there was no difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada, either in agricultural products or manufactured products. With that statement upon record, is President Taft going to veto this bill if we place these articles upon the free list, where he has said there is no difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada? No, gentlemen upon the other side of the House, you have got to find some further excuse than you have yet given for defeating these amendments.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, right here and right now I believe that we ought to keep the record straight and to make it right. It is hard for me to believe that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who last addressed the House, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON] can not see what seems so clear. They talk about sincerity, and they insist so earnestly upon their amendments that I must give them credit for their sincerity, but they certainly know if we inject in this bill items of free imports in favor of Canada, that under our treaties with other nations, the favored-nation clause will make the items we put on the free list in this bill entitled to the free admission from every country, because every other nation will insist, and properly, that under our treaties with them they are entitled to the same rates accorded freely to Canada.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Not yet. Knowing, then, that anyone who will vote conscientiously and honestly for the admission of one of these items into the free list in this bill will likewise vote for the same item in our free-list bill, and that those who are opposed to our general free-list bill will vote against this bill with these amendments in it——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HARDY. Not yet. I say, Mr. Chairman, they must know that to load this measure down with these additional items, making this bill, as I have explained, a free-list bill with all the world, under the favored-nation clause of our various treaties, we will give every man who is at heart opposed to this measure in the Senate a club with which to put it to death; and they must know this. Knowing that——

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Senate will not have an opportunity, if it chooses, to strike out all of these amendments?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly it will; but, on the other hand, the Senate will also have an opportunity to vote on this measure as it comes from the House and, by these very amendments the gentleman is now insisting on, an excuse to kill it.

Now, the gentleman knows that if the Senate should really have a majority in favor of these items that he proposes on the free list, they can put them onto this bill and pass it in the Senate. I believe if they could ever get them onto this bill and pass the bill through the Senate we might vote on it here, and we would vote for it unhesitatingly if you will assure us that your President will not veto it. We will vote for every free item here that comes from the Senate. But we will not load the bill down here so that the Senate will kill it, and we will not give a chance to the President for vetoing it by loading it down at all. We will give the President his bill just as he has asked it and we will make the Republican Senate swallow it or repudiate their own President. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARDY. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks he has got a better opportunity to get his free list through in a separate bill or on this bill, so far as the action of the President is concerned?

Mr. HARDY. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I feel sure we will get what is in this bill if you do not kill it by amendments. I feel sure that if we pass this bill just as it is the Senate will pass it; and, as expressed in the Democratic caucus the other night, I believe if we get this bill through and place it on the statute books and then pass our general free-list bill in the House and put it up to the Senate, that neither the Republican Senate nor the Republican President will have the nerve to veto it. Pass this bill as it is and I believe we will get both this bill and our free-list bill. Put these amendments on this bill and we will get nothing. [Applause on the Democratic side and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wheat, rye, oats, barley, and buckwheat, dried peas and beans, edible.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of lines 8 and 9, page 16, providing for placing wheat, rye, oats, barley, and buckwheat, dried peas and beans, edible, upon the free list.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, in support of that amendment, I would refer to what I have already said, that we are not granting to the consumer a reduction in the cost of living, because we maintain an almost similar duty under the terms of this bill to that which is placed on the manufactured commodities in the Payne tariff bill. I maintain that it is unjust to the producer to remove the duty from his raw material and to retain the duties upon the manufactured products, and that the argument for cheaper food is delusive to the consumer, because he will need to pay the price of the commodity in its manufactured state, and not as it is when it comes from the farmer. For that reason I offer this amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fresh vegetables: Potatoes, sweet potatoes, yams, turnips, onions, cabbages, and all other vegetables in their natural state.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, line 12, strike out the item "potatoes."

Mr. EDWARDS. What kind of potatoes, sweet or otherwise?

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that there are various sections in the Northern States where the only crop of the farmer is potatoes, and I measure my words when I say this; and because of the further fact that northeastern Canada can raise enough potatoes to feed the world. It is a well-known fact to those who have investigated the subject that we can not compete with the Canadian farmers to-day, when they pay 25 cents a bushel on every bushel of potatoes that they bring into this country, and so how can we hope to compete, with potatoes on the free list? I make this motion because I believe that the farmers who are engaged in raising potatoes are entitled to have their interests protected, at least to the extent of some one offering here an amendment in their behalf. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fresh fruits: Apples, pears, peaches, grapes, berries, and all other edible fruits in their natural state, except lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, shaddocks, pomelos, and pineapples.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 16, strike out the word "except" and strike out lines 17 and 18.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, there are several legislative curiosities in this so-called reciprocity agreement. This is one of them. In the provision regarding the admission of fresh fruit from the United States, on page 20, all fresh fruits grown in the United States are admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada; but when we come to the subject of the admission of fresh fruit from the Dominion of Canada into the United States, in line 16, page 16, this remarkable exception is made:

Except lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, shaddocks, pomelos, and pineapples.

That was not done by accident, Mr. Chairman. The reciprocity treaty of 1854 was evidently before these commissioners and our so-called agents when this pact was making; yet they deliberately added this exception, giving protection against the Dominion of Canada for the fruits grown in our Southern States. After taking good care of the peanut industry of North Carolina, then, for fear that up on the Mackenzie River or somewhere along the Pacific coast of Canada there might be grown some semitropical fruits like oranges and lemons, they put in this provision. They have taken away from the northern fruit grower all protection against the fruits grown immediately across the line in Canada. They deny to the northern farmer the benefit of whatever southern fruits might be brought in from Canada to insure full protection in the South. It is one of the legislative absurdities of the bill which I commend to our Democratic brethren.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dairy products: Butter, cheese, and fresh milk and cream: Provided, That cans actually used in the transportation of milk or cream may be passed back and forth between the two countries free of duty, under such regulations as the respective Governments may prescribe.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 21 to 25, inclusive, on page 16.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, as the committee knows, these lines have special reference to butter, cheese, fresh milk, and cream. At the present time we have a duty on butter of 6 cents a pound. Notwithstanding that protection we imported butter from Canada last year to the amount, I believe, of something like 1,000,000 pounds, and after it had paid this duty of 6 cents per pound it competed with the butter produced by the American farmer on this side of the line. I shall not prolong this debate, but in justice again to the American farmer, I offer this amendment and trust it may prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I had an amendment prepared similar to that offered by the gentleman from Idaho taking dairy products from the free list. If there is any one branch of the great farming industry that is affected more than all others by this reciprocity agreement, it is the dairy industry. If there is any one thing that the Canadians can do better than anything else, it is to produce butter and cheese. Canada is one of the greatest producers of cheese in all the world. She has been producing it for many, many years, while the dairy industry in this country as we now know it is of comparatively recent origin. Twenty years ago there was no dairying as we speak of it to-day. Of course every farmer made butter and cheese on his farm, but there was no modern dairying as we know it to-day.

Since that time, by virtue of dairy instructions in our State universities and agricultural schools, and the scientific study of soils and grasses, the farmers in the Northwestern States have been able to develop a great industry.

The great dairy countries of the world, Mr. Chairman, are Denmark, Belgium, Holland, Norway, and Russia. Many years ago expert cheese makers and butter makers from most of these countries settled in Canada, and there they have developed this great industry. Only in recent years have we developed it in this country, and thereby we have added hundreds of millions of dollars to our wealth. We have been enabled to take farms in the rough country where nothing could be produced and by grazing them have developed great dairies.

Now, this last year there was exported by all countries that export cheese a total amount of 485,000,000 pounds, of which Canada exported 172,000,000 pounds, over one-third, while the United States exported but 10,000,000 pounds. Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition is to throw open our markets to 172,000,000 pounds of Canadian cheese, to say nothing of the 6,000,000 pounds of butter which she also yearly exports, as compared to 9,000,000 pounds exported by us.

A great deal has been said as to the difference in the cost of cheese, or the price of cheese and butter in Canada and here.

In order to remove all doubt I went to the Library yesterday and went through the files of the Toronto Grocer, one of the leading dairy papers in Canada, and took the quotations on the 28th of every month, and took the same prices in Elgin for butter and Chicago for cheese for that day. I will read you the results. Take butter:

Average price of creamery butter for the year 1909, in Elgin and Toronto.

	Elgin.	Toronto.
	Cents.	Cents.
January	30½	25½
February	29½	24
March	29½	21

July	26	23
August	27½	21½
September	30	22
October	30½	24
November	31½	25
December	34½	25

On cheese the price differed from 2 to 4 cents a pound every single month in the year 1909, which is the last year for which we have the figures. The following shows the prices in detail:

Average price of full cream cheese for the year 1909 in Chicago and Toronto.

If this agreement is adopted it will destroy these great industries. It is said that he is a coward who will not turn back when first he discovers that he is wrong. We are likewise cowards if we perpetrate this injustice upon a great industry of our country, an injustice so great that it will paralyze the industry.

When we throw open our markets to the 170,000,000 pounds of cheese and 6,000,000 pounds of butter which Canada annually exports we are saying to our dairymen, "You must make up your minds to take from 5 to 7 cents per pound less for your butter and 2 to 4 cents per pound less for your cheese than heretofore." This will practically ruin these producers. Is this just? Has the Republican Party ceased to be the party of protection? When did you, who are classed as Republicans, cease to believe in the theory of protection as promulgated in our last party platform? We pledged to the American manufacturer and the American farmer a protective tariff equaling the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. We, who are classed as progressives, ask no greater protection than this, but we insist that we are entitled to that amount. Now you propose to throw this doctrine to the winds, and without even attempting to ascertain the cost of production at home and abroad you say to the farmer, "You must meet your competitor in our home markets whether you can produce as cheaply as he or not." In the preliminary report filed by the Tariff Board it is shown conclusively that the American dairyman can not produce a pound of butter or a pound of cheese as cheaply as his Canadian brother, but you ignore this. Whether it wrongs the farmers or not, you pay no attention to the fact that thousands of farms through Wisconsin and Minnesota can be made profitable by dairying when they could not be made profitable in any other way.

In the name of the dairymen of this country I protest against such action. I realize that the Democratic Party is going to put this through, assisted by a few Republicans, and it is folly for me to offer any amendments in behalf of these dairymen. Be that as it may, I should feel derelict in my duty if I did not voice their protests in as positive language as I can command. Again, I wish to protest in behalf of the thousands of firesides in our dairy States against this injustice. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eggs of barnyard fowl, in the shell.

Mr. LANGLEY. On page 17, line 1, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 1, strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose of putting myself on record in opposition to this provision. The egg industry is an important one in my district, as well as in other agricultural sections of the country. A great many eggs are already imported from Canada under the present tariff rate. It will necessarily follow, if they are placed upon the free list, that a much larger number will be imported, and, according to the law of supply and demand, this will necessarily reduce the egg market in this country; and on behalf of the farmers who will be injured by this provision I have offered this amendment, although I know from what has occurred here this afternoon that it is fruitless for me to offer it, because I already hear the machinery of the steam roller starting up, and the gentleman in charge of it is becoming impatient to roll it over this amendment as he has over all others of a like character that have been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seeds: Flaxseed or linseed, cotton seed, and other oil seeds; grass seed, including timothy and clover seed; garden, field, and other seed not herein otherwise provided for, when in packages weighing over 1 pound each (not including flower seed).

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, flaxseed is a product of the Northwest. When ground is broken up in a new country that is the first crop that is raised. It is the poor man's crop. This industry has grown in this northwest country and the duty should be left on flaxseed to protect and to help the new settlers. I hope my motion may prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fish of all kinds, fresh, frozen, packed in ice, salted, or preserved in any form, except sardines and other fish preserved in oil; and shellfish of all kinds, including oysters, lobsters, and clams in any state, fresh or packed, and coverings of the foregoing.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning on line 9, page 17, strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seal, herring, whale, and other fish oil, including sod oil: Provided, That fish oil, whale oil, seal oil, and fish of all kinds, being the product of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, shall be admitted into Canada as the product of the United States, and, similarly, that fish oil, whale oil, seal oil, and fish of all kinds, being the product of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada, shall be admitted into the United States as the product of Canada.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 14, after the word "herring," strike out the word "whale"; and also, on lines 15 and 19, strike out the words "whale oil."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the ships in Canada that are engaged in the whale-oil enterprise are constructed in Norway and cost $23,000 each. The American ships that compete with them are manufactured in American shipyards, by American workmen receiving American wages, and fly the American flag, and cost $80,000 each.

Mr. SISSON. Then buy them in Norway.

Mr. KAHN. The men who man the Canadian ships are Chinese and Japanese. The men who man the American ships are white men. The Chinese and Japanese get $40 a month and feed themselves. The white men on the American ships get $75 a month and are fed by the companies that manufacture the whale oil. If you allow the product of Canada to come in free, as contemplated by the pending measure, you wipe out an American industry and you again drive American ships off the seas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Timber, hewn, sided or squared otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, strike out lines 24 and 25.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, let me explain here that I am also going to move to strike out the four succeeding paragraphs on page 18 of this bill. All five of these paragraphs, you will observe, propose to put lumber, in some form or other, upon the free list. I am opposed to all of it. I think we have little enough protection to lumber now. I have already indicated, as fully as I could in five minutes, my views upon this question, and I thought I would explain now that it is my purpose in offering all five of these amendments to take lumber in any form off the free list embodied in this treaty, so that when I offer these four amendments I can do so without explanation. Moreover, it is evident that it is perfectly useless to make an argument in support of all of these amendments, as those favoring the treaty have already demonstrated that they do not proposed to permit an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "wharves," in line 25, page 17, strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the words "shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, grandilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods."

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say upon this matter. It is simply one of a series of amendments that I stated that I would offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, not further manufactured than sawed.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 1 and 2 on page 18.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "not further manufactured than sawed."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this in effect is the same proposition again, and if adopted will give free lumber. I am not going to take up the time to discuss it [applause] except to say—well, Mr. Chairman, since there seems to be such a unanimous expression of delight that I am talking I think I will discuss it. I am in hopes you brethren over there will have by this time been able to solve the proposition properly and have given sufficient consideration to the reasoning that has been poured out here for your benefit that if you really and truly are in favor of free lumber you will adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, not further manufactured than sawed.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 1 and 2, on page 18.

Mr. LANGLEY. I see the steam roller is operating——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. The amendment was properly put and acted upon by the committee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Paving posts, railroad ties, and telephone, trolley, electric-light, and telegraph poles of cedar or other woods.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 3 and 4 on page 18.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago it is evident the House does not want to hear any further debate——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. LANGLEY. I started to say, I see that the steam roller is oiled and ready to roll over all these amendments, and I do not desire to detain the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wooden staves of all kinds, not further manufactured than listed or jointed, and stave bolts.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 5 and 6 on page 18.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the amendment for the reasons already stated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the item the gentleman is trying to strike out has been passed.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Clerk had read down to "stave bolts," in line 6, and I moved to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment is in time. If there is any confusion it was due to the Chair's fault. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman, which is to strike out lines 5 and 6 on page 18.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pickets and palings.

Mr. LANGLEY. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kentucky ought to give his reasons—— [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be some display of the intelligence that lies behind such a motion.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee, who is always courteous and amiable, does not mean quite what his language might imply. He will recall that I said to the committee a little while ago that I would offer a motion to strike out all these paragraphs to place any lumber in any form on the free list, because I did not think that we have any too much protection on lumber now. Moreover, out of consideration for gentlemen on that side who have been protesting against debate on all these amendments to the treaty, I have refrained from debating these other motions to strike out the free lumber provision. I could debate them and give an intelligent reason, I think, why the motions should be adopted. But I know the gentleman from Tennessee and the other gentlemen on both sides have made up their minds to vote down all of these amendments, and there is no need of my wasting any more breath upon the subject. I merely wanted to put myself and the majority of the House on record.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plaster rock, or gypsum, crude, not ground.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 8, page 18, the following words, to wit: "Plaster rock, or gypsum, crude, not ground."

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the Members of this House for only a few moments in order to say a few words which I think I am in duty bound to say in defense of what I think is justice to my congressional district. Under this paragraph of the treaty crude gypsum is placed on the free list. As some of you know, doubtless, gypsum is the substance from which, at the present day, common wall plasters for our houses are made. It exists in abundant quantities in many of the States of this Union. When, at the last session of Congress, the Ways and Means Committee had under consideration what is known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, there were extended hearings on the question of how much duty should be levied upon gypsum. Under the Dingley bill the tariff on crude gypsum was 50 cents per ton. The bill, as it passed the House, reduced it from 50 cents to 40 cents a ton. I thought there was no demand for that, but the bill went to the Senate, and there the duty was reduced to 30 cents a ton. Under this trade agreement crude gypsum is placed on the free list.

I want to say that the State which I have the honor in part to represent is great in many respects. Great in agriculture, because there is no State in the Union that grows so abundantly such a vast variety of agricultural products. I am opposed to this bill because I believe it does an injustice to the great agricultural interests of my State. But Oklahoma is a great State from the standpoint of its wealth in minerals—coal, oil, gas, iron, asphalt, glass sand, gypsum, and many other minerals. In my congressional district Providence has deposited absolutely unlimited deposits of gypsum. My congressional district has the crude gypsum sufficient to supply not only the United States, but the entire world with gypsum.

Now, then, in 1910, the little tariff of 30 cents per ton upon crude gypsum brought into the Treasury of the United States over $100,000. You gentlemen who believe in a tariff for revenue only ought to support the little tariff of 30 cents per ton upon crude gypsum. The effect of this bill will be to take $100,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and put it in the hands of a few manufacturers of gypsum in the northeastern portion of the United States. People who build houses will not get plaster for their houses any cheaper. This is a discrimination against the gypsum of the West. It appears to me that the men who prepared this so-called treaty, or pact, could not look down into the Southwest a thousand miles away and see the gypsum in the second congressional district of Oklahoma. They did, however, look up north and see the gypsum beds of Nova Scotia, New Breton, and Newfoundland, and placed gypsum on the free list for the benefit of the owners of Canadian gypsum deposits, and the owners of gypsum mills in the northeastern portion of the United States. I enter my solemn protest against this injustice. I believe in the policy of protection. I love my great new State, where I have lived ever since its birth. We have magnificent opportunities for agriculture, and we have magnificent opportunities to become a great manufacturing State. No measure shall have my support that I believe will retard the growth and development of my State or that discriminates against the industries of my people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fluorspar, crude, not ground.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, on page 18, line 13, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Payne tariff law placed a protective duty upon fluorspar. Prior to that time this industry was not protected. The question was fully considered at the last session, and it was found that there are fluorspar mines in Kentucky, Illinois, and a number of other States, but that the ruinous competition of the foreign mineral prevented these mines from being successfully operated. This protective duty was accordingly imposed, justly, I think, and the wisdom of it has been demonstrated by the profitable operation of these mines since then.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Are the gaugers interested in this?

Mr. LANGLEY. The gaugers are probably interested, I will say to the gentleman; they are good Kentuckians and naturally want to see all of Kentucky's industries prosper. This is an important industry in Kentucky. I am satisfied that you are going to vote this amendment down, of course; but I have the right, I think, to offer it and be heard a moment on it, if I desire to be heard. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

It has been only two years since this question was considered by Congress and this duty fixed as a result. I for one am opposed to nullifying by a treaty action so recently taken by Congress, after due deliberation, and therefore I move to strike this paragraph out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rolled round wire rods in the coil, of iron or steel, not over three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 14, page 19, the following:

"Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

"Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

"Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

"Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight,"——

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that enough has been read already to show that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order. The Chair will examine the amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the point is that the amendment is in violation of the rule, in that it is not germane to the question or paragraph——

Mr. BARTLETT. Or to the subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], if he desires to be heard on the question.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if there is any point as to its being in violation of that portion of the rule which provides that no amendment shall be in order which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill, or which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed, then, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to change the amendment I have offered by offering it as a new paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman did.

Mr. LENROOT. It is substantially that; and as to that, if the point of order is still made, I would like to be heard upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order, as I understand the proposition, the gentleman offers an amendment relating to duties between this country and Canada, not the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is one enumerating numerous articles that shall be free of duty when imported from the Dominion of Canada into the United States. The bill before the committee is one arranging reciprocal trade relations between the Dominion of Canada and the United States. Had the amendment been one to put the articles enumerated on the free list, no matter from what country imported, it would have been clearly out of order. But in the opinion of the Chair, it being confined to articles imported from the Dominion of Canada, the amendment is in order, and the point of order is therefore overruled. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

"Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

"Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

"Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye, flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

"Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

"Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

"Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is the free-list bill proposed by that side of the House, which it is now proposed to apply to imports from Canada.

I am well aware of the fact that there is no attempt being made this afternoon to legislate upon this very important bill. Every Member on that side of the House, from the hustings all over this country, has charged that this House has ceased to be a deliberative body. But, gentlemen, with your majority here this afternoon, I say that this House never was less deliberative since I have been here than it is at this moment. [Applause on the Republican side.] Your majority does not dare to consider these amendments upon their merits. You are bound and shackled by a party caucus, and if it was not for that, some of these amendments would be incorporated in this bill.

Now, gentlemen of the majority, if your free-list bill that you propose shall fail of passage, upon you will fall the responsibility before the country of refusing to secure some relief to the consumers of this country in reduction of duties. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say. It is apparent that the free-list bill that we intend to bring before the House next week means in many of its items a reduction of the cost of living to the people of the United States, because we put the articles on the free list as coming from all the world; but, so far as Canada is concerned, it is absurd to claim that agricultural implements or meats or many of the other products named in that bill would ever come from Canada in any considerable quantities if those articles were included in this bill. If the gentleman really desires to enact this free list into law, I hope after this bill has passed the House he will use his influence with the Senators of the United States who agree with him to enable us to send the bill to the President. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. The Senators from his State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the articles above enumerated, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, shall be exempt from duty when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that the following articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), are admitted into the Dominion of Canada free of duty, namely:

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, after the word "Provided," in line 15, on page 19, I move to insert the words "That this act shall not become operative before January 1, 1912," and after the word "duty," in line 17, I move to insert the word "only."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Provided," in line 15, on page 19, insert the words: "That this act shall not become operative before January 1, 1912," and after the word "duty," in line 17, on said page, insert the word "only."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering this amendment is that this act affects principally the products of the farmer, and that there is now in the hands of the farmer a considerable part of the crops that were grown and produced with no suggestion that there would be any legislation that would materially affect the prices of these commodities, and that under those circumstances, if this bill should become a law, which I hope it will not, unless it is so amended as to equalize its provisions to all industries alike, it is only fair that its operation should not take effect upon the products that were grown while the present law existed, for, even in the prospects of the passage of this bill, there has been a lowering of the prices of the farm products, and the farming industry of this country has been injured to a very appreciable extent without any corresponding advantage to that industry.

If there was a general adjustment of the tariff so as to distribute the general effect, it would be quite a different proposition than that which here confronts us.

If this bill is to be enacted into law, let it be so amended that its provisions do not apply to the products of the last season, but to those only to be produced which have been planted with a knowledge that this bill is likely to become a law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 18, page 19, by inserting, after the word "evidence," the following:

"That the Dominion of Canada has so revised its patent laws as to give to inventors of the United States holding Canadian patents the same privileges as are now given by the United States to inventors of Canada holding United States patents, and shall have satisfactory evidence."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this bill. It relates to the patent laws, and this is a treaty relating to tariff duties between the two countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, as pointed out two or three days ago, the patent laws of Canada are such that they require an American holding a patent from Canada either to sell his patent or to come to Canada for the purpose of manufacturing the article. Therefore, so long as these laws obtain, the concessions granted under this agreement are absolutely ineffective. It is an idle ceremony for this House to pass an agreement under which Canada proposes to give us concessions so far as access to her markets are concerned when she still retains within her internal legal system the power to render those provisions prohibitive and ineffective. Therefore, it seems to me, it is not only germane but necessary to adopt this amendment if we desire to make this agreement effective so far as Canadian markets are concerned.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on the point of order. While I shall not vote for the amendment if it be placed before the House, it seems to me that it is not subject to a point of order. As I understand the amendment, it is proposed to amend the proviso so that it will read that when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence that—relating to the patent laws—he shall make proclamation that the following articles, and so forth. In other words, to make the dutiable and free list provided in the bill dependent in part upon the duties fixed by Canada and in part upon the revision of her patent laws. Clearly, it seems to me germane, in order to provide that our duties shall be reciprocal, and that we would have a right under this bill to add any provision as a condition precedent to our granting a lower rate of duty or the free list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite get the reading of the amendment in full, but I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee, or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for section 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of paper, board, or wood pulp by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, or any Province or other subdivision of government thereof, where the same was in whole or in part produced (either in the form of wood or pulp or otherwise) or manufactured: Provided, however, That the rates of duty as now collected upon the articles in this section mentioned shall in no case be increased.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the only difference between the substitute I have offered and section 2 of the bill as now written is that before Canada can enjoy our markets free of duty on print paper she must remove from each and every Province in Canada her embargo on pulp wood. I believe that it is only fair that, if we are to take the finished product from Canada or any other country in the world, that country should let free raw material come into our market unrestricted. This section is not as the bill was originally introduced at all. Therefore it is subject to amendment without affecting the bill. Section 2 as now in the bill was prepared by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and presented to the committee and adopted as a substitute for the section that was in the bill when it was first introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], because that section was not properly worded. The only difference between the sections in the bill and the one I offer is that Canada is required to remove her restrictions on pulp wood.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the situation in regard to pulp and paper is a little different in the bill from the situation as to any other article named. There is no prohibition of exportation on the other articles named in the bill. There is no export duty on pulp and paper coming from Canada into the United States. The Dominion of Canada has levied no charge, made no restrictions, fixed no export duty on pulp or paper coming from Canada into the United States. Most of the pulp paper probably will be made in the future at least from pulp wood cut on the public lands known as the Crown lands.

Those Crown lands are not owned by the Dominion of Canada; they are owned by the individual Provinces. Some of those Provinces are very much opposed to permitting any pulp wood to be exported from the Dominion into the United States. The Province of Ontario, for instance, whenever it sells pulp wood upon the Crown lands, puts into the contract the specific provision that that wood shall not be sent out of the Dominion of Canada for manufacture. The result of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], if he states it correctly, would be that any one Province of Canada could absolutely prohibit the taking effect of the provision in the bill and render entirely nugatory all of the legislation in reference to pulp and paper. It would no longer be the action of the Dominion of Canada, but any one Province by putting into a contract for the sale of its pulp wood the provision that that pulp wood should be manufactured in the Dominion of Canada would entirely prevent the operation of the law, if this be enacted into law, and the Province of Ontario or some other Province would take advantage of that power and entirely prohibit all benefits to come from this provision of the law.

In my judgment, it is to the interest not only of the paper consumers in the United States, but of the paper-manufacturing industry in the United States, that the great forests of black spruce in Canada may be utilized by exporting from Canada for the benefit of our paper mills that pulp wood controlled by these Provinces. If the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan should prevail, so far as paper and pulp are concerned, the bill might just as well be thrown into the waste basket, because it would never have any effect.

The proposition contained in section 2 is identically the language of the agreement. The first bill that was presented did not follow out the agreement. Somebody made an error in drawing the bill. While this section 2 has been called the Mann amendment, all I did was to take the language of the agreement, write it out, and present it to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the only thing left out of the agreement in the section as presented with reference to pulp and paper were these words, which were supernumerary:

Provided, That such paper and board, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp.

That was a repetition of language already in the agreement, so in drawing the section that language was left out. In other respects it is in the identical language of the agreement, and carries out not only the intent of the agreement, but makes a law which will be of benefit, in my opinion, both to the consumer and manufacturer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman will admit that he prepared the amendment that I have offered? It was prepared by the gentleman, and I give him credit for preparing an exceedingly intelligent amendment to that bill. He brought the two amendments to the committee, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] offered the one that is now in the bill, and I offer this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(By unanimous consent leave was granted Mr. MANN to proceed for five minutes.)

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was not able to be certain that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan was the other provision which I had prepared. I thought it was as it was read, but the gentleman misstated or erroneously stated its effect.

Mr. FORDNEY. Not intentionally.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not intentionally. The provision in the bill will admit, if this becomes a law, at once, free of duty, paper or wood pulp made from pulp wood cut on private lands in Canada, on which there is no restriction of exportation.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan would admit paper and pulp from Provinces only as each Province removed all restrictions on the exportation of pulp wood, and would not treat the entire Dominion of Canada as an entity, but treats each Province by itself. There may have been doubt as to which was the better provision. While I think, under the terms of the agreement and under the terms of the bill, it is quite competent for the House, without disturbing the arrangement between the two Executives, to adopt either of those provisions, still, in my judgment, it is better, now that the provision which is in the bill is in the agreement, to follow the language of the agreement and admit the paper made from private-lands pulp wood free of duty without leaving the Provinces the power to control it. If I felt that it was necessary, and if it were not for the lateness of the hour, I would be glad to discuss the matter more at length, but I do not feel at this time at liberty to detain the House further in regard to the proposition. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you, gentlemen; I will not take more than a minute. Instead of the gentleman's [Mr. MANN] statement being correct that the language in the bill is exactly as agreed upon by our representatives and the representatives of Canada, he is mistaken. I think the gentleman makes a mistake, an honest mistake, of course, because Mr. Fielding, on the floor of the House of Parliament in Canada, stated that the Government of the United States demanded this very same thing, but they were unable to agree to it because they could not bind the Provinces, showing conclusively that the matter had been discussed and that our representatives had aimed to get the very thing that I am asking for, but the Canadian representatives were unable to bind the Provinces. That was his statement and the substance of his (Fielding's) letter to our Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of further readjusting the duties on importations into the United States of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, and of the exportation into the Dominion of Canada of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, the President of the United States is authorized and requested to negotiate trade agreements with the Dominion of Canada wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and the further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be added as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the United States from amending or repealing the same at any time without notice to the Dominion of Canada, nor shall the Dominion of Canada be required to give to the United States any notice before amending or repealing any law responsive to this act.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have just offered authorizes either this country or Canada to withdraw from the reciprocal trade arrangement now proposed at any time without notice to the other. The pending so-called Canadian reciprocity bill occupies a peculiar position. It is not a treaty, as some Members have seemed to suppose it is. It is merely a bill, which, if passed, will become a law of the United States. Then, if Canada passes a similar law, as specified in this act, the President is to issue a proclamation putting our law into effect. We authorize him to do so in the bill. But not one word is said in the bill as to how it is ever to be repealed, if perchance we should be dissatisfied with it after a few years' trial. Neither is any method provided for its amendment. Manifestly, Canada has some interest in what we shall do in the way of amending or repealing this bill in the future. Our bill admits the products of Canada into this country upon certain terms, provided Canada shall pass a law admitting certain of our products into that country upon certain terms that we have specified.

Now, when the bill we are passing to-day becomes a law, and Canada has passed an act containing exactly the schedules upon our imports into that country that we have stipulated in our bill that she shall pass, it seems to me that a sort of a contract will have been entered into between the two countries. Neither country should arbitrarily withdraw from the agreement after it is entered into without giving some notice to the other, unless it is provided in the bill at the time we pass it that such a thing can be done. This is exactly what I propose by the amendment I have offered.

Reject this amendment and you may have a hard time getting out of the agreement you are now entering into, if you should ever want out. This country will at least desire to change the schedules of this trade arrangement, or some of them, from time to time, and unless this additional section be added no express power will be reserved to do so. Adopt the amendment, and either this country or Canada will be at liberty, without any specified notice to the other, to amend or repeal these reciprocal trade laws at any time. It would certainly be the part of wisdom to do so.

This afternoon I heard the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the leader of the Democratic majority in this House, request his party followers to vote against all amendments that shall be proposed to this bill. Therefore, I can have no hopes that the amendment I have proposed will be accepted. But it is something that has been overlooked, and I feel it is my duty to the country to offer it. Maybe if it is voted down here it will be added to the bill when it reaches the Senate, so that we will not tie our hands for all time to come to what may be a bad bargain.

If the Democrats had not held a caucus in advance of the consideration of this bill and decided on a set program, Members offering amendments at this time could have them fairly considered. For that reason I want to say in passing, that I am unalterably opposed to caucuses. I believe in leaving Members free to exercise their best judgment at all times, otherwise we are reduced from a deliberative body to a mere set of parrots repeating the votes of our so-called leaders.

I am friendly to the Canadian reciprocity bill, and am going to vote for it on the roll call. The amendment is not offered to embarrass those in charge of the bill on the other side of the House; it is offered to cover what appears to be a palpable omission. True, I believe the United States will have the right to repeal or amend this law at any time without having it so expressed in the bill, but it does appear that it would be much better to have that matter made clear and certain by having it stipulated in the bill. That is the sole object of the amendment I have offered in the form of an additional section to the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House without amendment, with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, and had instructed him to report the same to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report the same back forthwith amended by placing on the free list lumber of all kinds, whether rough, dressed, planed, or grooved; shingles and lath, the product of the Dominion of Canada, when imported from Canada into the United States; and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

To recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back forthwith amended by placing on the free list lumber of all kinds, whether rough, dressed, planed, or grooved; shingles and lath, the product of the Dominion of Canada, when imported from Canada into the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman is not entitled to make that motion. There is no debate permitted on a motion to recommit.

Mr. NORRIS. The previous question, I think, is proper in order to prevent amendment.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. No amendment can be offered.

The SPEAKER. Without the previous question amendments will be in order. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the previous question on the gentleman's motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. On the motion to recommit I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to recommit, and on that motion the gentleman demands the yeas and nays. All those who are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fifty gentlemen have arisen—a sufficient number.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty gentlemen have arisen, and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. DALZELL, and several other Members demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will answer "yea"; those opposed "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 268, nays 89, answered "present" 3, not voting 29, as follows:

YEAS—268.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present the certificate of election of WILLIAM S. KENYON as Senator from Iowa for the unexpired term of my late colleague, Jonathan P. Dolliver, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials of WILLIAM S. KENYON, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Iowa a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy in the term ending March 4, 1913, caused by the death of Jonathan P. Dolliver, were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present the certificate of election of my colleague, Mr. NATHAN P. BRYAN, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials of NATHAN P. BRYAN, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Florida a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1911, were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. KENYON is present, and I ask that the oath of his office be now administered to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator elect from Iowa will present himself at the Vice President's desk and the oath will be administered to him.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the same statement with reference to my colleague [Mr. BRYAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator elect from Florida will present himself at the Vice President's desk.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. BRYAN were escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. FLETCHER, respectively, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Presiding Officer.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Auditor of the Treasury Department relative to the destruction of certain papers on the files of the department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest. (H. Doc. No. 24.)

The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment of the committee on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the enactment of legislation placing appointments and promotions in the Consular Service upon a merit basis, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of the northwest section of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against any further action being taken in the case of the election of a Senator from Illinois, which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Robert Emmet Memorial Association, of Buffalo, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Church of the Brethren of Pasadena, Cal., and a petition of the Union Sunday School, of Neutral, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation for the suppression of the opium evil, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 286, Patrons of Husbandry, of Hillsdale County, Mich., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Brace, Tenn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of Local Union No. 249, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, of Villa Ridge, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER presented memorials of 98 citizens of Franklin and Berlin, in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Takoma Park Citizens' Association of the District of Columbia, praying for the adoption of a universal transfer system for the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. I present a letter in the nature of a petition, signed by the president of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, of Boston, Mass. The letter is short. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL HEADQUARTERS
BOOT AND SHOE WORKERS' UNION,
Boston, Mass., April 22, 1911.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
1765 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Speaking for the shoe workers who are employed in the principal industry of New England, I venture to solicit your vote and influence against any tariff legislation which would put finished leather and shoes on the free list.

The greater efficiency of labor in the shoe industry in the United States, as against any foreign country, is not sufficient to offset the lower standard of living in all foreign countries, as compared with the United States, notwithstanding the cheaper labor prices which prevail in foreign countries. To put shoes and finished leather on the free list or to in any way reduce the present tariff would compel American shoe manufacturers to meet foreign competition through the only avenue open to them, namely, to attack the wages of the shoe workers and thereby bring about a standard of wages lower than at present exists, which would result in industrial warfare and no doubt eventually establish the lower standard of wages, consequently the lower standard of living.

We therefore trust that your vote and influence will be directed against any legislation which will reduce the tariff on shoes. The shoe workers who would be directly and adversely affected by a reduction of the tariff on shoes number at a very conservative estimate 150,000, who, with those dependent upon them, would make at least three-quarters of a million people who are directly concerned.

We will be glad to have your views upon this question.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN F. TOBIN, General President.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of Gaspee Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Providence, R. I., praying for the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 28.

Whereas Congress has provided in the Post Office appropriation bill for an additional railway mail service division headquarters; and

Whereas at present railway mail service division headquarters are located at St. Paul, Chicago, St. Louis, Fort Worth, San Francisco, and Seattle, leaving Denver with railroads radiating in every direction, almost in the very center of the vast territory surrounded by these cities, making it the logical place from a geographical standpoint and also from the standpoint of railway mail service, being the only available important railroad terminal covering service over the following-named roads: Union Pacific, Kansas City, Julesburg, and Cheyenne divisions; Rock Island; Burlington; Rio Grande; Missouri Pacific; Santa Fe; Colorado & Southern; Northern, Southern, Clear Creek, and South Park divisions; Colorado Midland; Denver, Northwestern & Pacific; and Denver, Laramie & Northwestern. Denver is already the division headquarters for the post-office inspection bureau, and when the new building is completed will be the distributing headquarters for supplies, stamped paper, etc., making it the only logical place for the location of the additional railway mail service division headquarters: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of Colorado, now in session, urgently requests our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to secure from the honorable Postmaster General the location of the additional division headquarters in the city of Denver.

STEPHEN R. FITZGERALD,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE MCLACHLAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved, April 14, 1911.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Colorado on the 14th day of April, A. D. 1911, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. Recorded in book —, page —.

JAMES B. PEARCE, Secretary of State.

He also presented a memorial of Union Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Southington, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Danbury, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Connecticut Peace Society, praying for the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the citizens of the State are interested in the cause of peace and arbitration, now under consideration;

Whereas we are convinced that treaties between nations submitting all questions to a court of arbitration are the most effective agents for the advancement of universal peace and the limitation of armaments; and

Whereas President Taft has already suggested that England and the United States ratify such a treaty; and

Whereas this suggestion has been so favorably received by Earl Grey and the English people generally: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That we formally express our deep interest in the cause of peace and arbitration; and furthermore be it

Resolved, That we especially approve of the action of our President in suggesting the unrestricted arbitration treaty with Great Britain, and that we heartily favor its ratification; and finally be it

Resolved, That these resolutions be sent by the chief clerk to the Hon. Mr. Taft, to Senators NELSON and CLAPP.

Adopted April 19, 1911.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry railway postal clerks in the State of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation granting relief to employees of the post-office service from certain arbitrary orders issued from time to time, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of Foley Bros. & Kelly, of St. Paul, Minn., praying for a more equitable settlement between the United States and Canada regarding the duty on tea, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of the Connecticut Peace Society, of Hartford; of the Patrick Sarsfield Club, of Waterbury; and of sundry citizens of Danbury and Naugatuck, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of Local Grange of Hillstown, of Local Grange of Farmington, and of Eureka Grange, of New Hartford, all of the Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of 300 citizens of Hartford, East Hartford, and Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of a national department of public health, which were referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. WARREN. I present a resolution adopted by the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 1—Protesting against advance in rates and urging Congress to declare the rates in effect January 1, 1910, to be reasonable maximum rates.

Whereas the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association stands for just, fair, and reasonable treatment of railroad corporations, their stockholders and employees, and at the same time demands fair, just, and reasonable rates to the shippers and the public; and

Whereas the railway companies of the United States, by concerted action, are attempting to make a general advance in their rates; and

Whereas this association believes that, with the increased population and traffic and with the present basis of net earnings, the railroads of the United States are in a prosperous condition and receiving on an average as much net profit on their investment as farmers, stock raisers, and producers generally are making upon their investment: Now, therefore be it Resolved, 1. That we protest against the general advance in rates by the railroads of the United States.

2. That we protest against and oppose advances in rates in particular cases, except where the railroads, after full and fair investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, can show that they do not receive reasonable compensation for the service performed.

3. That we indorse the action taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission in suspending the general advances in rates that have been proposed by the railroads.

4. That we favor the amendment of the present interstate-commerce law which now places the burden of proof on the railroads to justify advances in rates made after January 1, 1910, so that the rates which were in effect on January 1, 1910, shall be declared by law to be reasonable maximum rates, and which shall not be exceeded by the railroads except where the railroads, upon complaint and after hearing, shall show to the Interstate Commerce Commission that it is just and reasonable that they be permitted to advance any of the said rates in effect on January 1, 1910.

Resolution 2—Urging valuation of railroads.

Whereas the railways of the United States are demanding an increase of freight rates in order to raise their earnings to a higher standard of return than the average of the past; and

Whereas the basis of the claim is that their properties have largely increased in value; and

Whereas the question of the value of railway property is made an important factor in all rate litigation; and

Whereas the shippers and the public have no means of showing, and the commission has at present no adequate means of ascertaining, the value of such property: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association, That we urge upon Congress the enactment of a law providing for the immediate valuation of railway properties and the ascertainment of all details of cost and investment.

Resolution 3—Relative to furnishing cars to transport live stock and other perishable freight, and to give prompt and efficient service.

Resolved by the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association in convention assembled April 4, 1911, at Cheyenne, Wyo., That we respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to enact suitable legislation compelling the railroads to provide sufficient facilities to perform with dispatch their duties as common carriers in furnishing cars and transporting all freight, including live stock, and to promptly transport same, and to exchange loaded and empty cars, and otherwise to provide sufficient facilities, fixing penalties for failure of such duties, and giving to the shipper the right to recover, in any court of any State or Territory having jurisdiction, his damages and attorney's fees; and also empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce penalties for violation of the act, and to make rules and regulations with respect to the time and manner of giving notice for cars, furnishing cars, exchange and interchange of cars, and all needful rules and regulations in the administration of such law, and providing rules applicable to the different classes and kind of freight and the varying circumstances and conditions of shipment.

Resolution 4—Speed limit on live-stock trains.

Resolved by the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association in convention assembled April 4, 1911, at Cheyenne, Wyo., That in order to secure better service from railroads in the transportation of live stock we recommend to Congress the enactment of a law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to prescribe a minimum speed limit for stock trains to suit the conditions in different localities.

Resolution 11—Urging Federal control of the unappropriated semiarid grazing lands.

The Wyoming Stock Growers' Association in convention assembled at Cheyenne, Wyo., April 4, 1911, hereby declares that—

We believe that the prosperity and development of the stock-raising industry on the public grazing lands of the arid and semiarid West is seriously threatened by the present indiscriminate methods of grazing, and we strongly recommend the early passage by Congress of a bill providing for Federal control of these unappropriated public grazing lands and a just and reasonable method of leasing such lands.

We favor a bill to operate either under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior or of Agriculture and along the general lines definitely recommended by this organization at its annual convention in Denver in 1908, and approved at all its conventions since that date. This measure would be of great practical advantage to the stockmen of the West, gives full protection and encouragement to the actual settler and home maker, and, through the distribution of the net revenues received in the construction of schools and good roads in the districts from which the funds are obtained, would be of great public benefit.

Resolution 12—Urging classification of public lands.

To better facilitate the leasing and control of the grazing lands, as outlined in the bill approved by this association, we vigorously urge Congress to provide without delay for the classification of the unappropriated unreserved public lands into grazing and agricultural districts.

Resolution 8.

Whereas there was introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, and to be further legislated upon at the special session now convened, a reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada; and

Whereas this agreement proposes to import into the United States from Canada all the products of the farm, such as grains and vegetables and all classes of live stock, free of duty; and

Whereas all the products of the manufacturer, including those articles manufactured from the hides of cattle, sheep, and from wool, are retained on the tax list at their present rates; and

Whereas we believe that if agricultural implements, harness, saddles, boots, shoes, wool, and woolen goods are to remain protected for the benefit of the manufacturer and the skilled laborer, the Government of the United States is asking the farmer and stock raiser to submit to a very unfair agreement by putting our products on the free list to compete with the same products produced at a better advantage in Canada in order that we may induce the Canadians to buy more freely of our protected manufactured articles: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association, this 4th day of April, 1911, does hereby protest against a policy that is not evenly drawn. We claim an equal protection with manufactured articles or that all be placed on the free list, especially those manufactured from our products: Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately sent our Senators and Representative in Congress.

Mr. WARREN presented memorials of Local Union No. 158, of Thomson; of Local Union No. 67, of Natural Dam; of Local Union No. 6, of Felts Mills; and of Local Union No. 7, of Palmer Falls, all of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GAMBLE presented the memorial of H. H. Heydlauff and 21 other citizens of Day County, S. Dak., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ALASKA COAL-LAND CASES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate ordered printed as a document the decision rendered by Judge Hanford, of the United States district court for the western district of Washington, in reference to the coal-land laws of Alaska. A few days after that the United States judge for the eastern district of Washington rendered a decision in a case involving the same state of facts, but taking just the opposite view from that of Judge Hanford. I present a copy of that decision with a view to having it printed as a document. I will not ask unanimous consent of the Senate to have the decision printed at this time, but that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the decision will be referred to the Committee on Printing for recommendation.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in answer to inquiries from various Senators concerning the matter of the committees of the Senate, I desire to say that the probabilities are that the committee on committees will be able to report to the Senate on Thursday next. There is a bare possibility that it may go beyond that a day or two, but I feel pretty safe in making the suggestion I have made.

In view of the fact that a good deal of work is yet to be done by the committee on committees, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator if he means work or pacification? [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, both. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not believe that the Senator means pacification. I do not think he would waste any time in that way.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, before the motion is put I simply desire to say that, so far as the committee assignments of the minority are concerned, the list has been practically completed and is ready for submission to the Senate at any time when it is the pleasure of the majority party to present a list for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 13 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 12 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, April 27, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 24, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for that broad, generous, godlike spirit which is gradually coming into the world, the fruits of which are righteousness, truth, justice, mercy, peace, good will toward men, and which tend to solidify the peoples of all creeds and of all races into one great family, and which will finally bring the answer to that prayer which falls daily from the lips of thousands: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

And now, O God our Father, in whom are centered all our longings, hopes, and aspirations, be very near to the Member of this House who has been bereft of the companion who has walked lovingly and sympathetically by his side through many years, sharing his joys and sorrows. Comfort him and the rest of the stricken family by the blessed hope of the gospel, that they may look forward to that realm where neither death nor sorrow ever come; and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 21, 1911, was read and approved.

CLERK AND MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON DISPOSITION OF USELESS EXECUTIVE PAPERS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 117).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers a resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House compensation, at the rate, respectively, of $6 per day and $60 per month, for the services of a clerk and messenger to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers during the remainder of the present session.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that this resolution and all like it, proposing to pay money out of the contingent fund of the House, must under the rule be considered in Committee of the Whole. I do this for the purpose of establishing a precedent which has hitherto been established in Democratic Houses but not followed in Republican Houses.

Now, if the Chair will hear me a moment, I call attention to Rule XXIII, section 3, of the new rules adopted by this House, which reads as follows:

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Referring to the construction that has been placed on this rule of the House by Democratic Speakers, I call the Chair's attention to a line of decisions in volume 4 of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents, page 1058, beginning with section 4862:

Mr. Hinds says:

Resolutions from the Committee on Accounts authorizing expenditures from the contingent fund do not, according to the later ruling, require consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Now, to sustain the point I make, I quote:

On December 19, 1888, Mr. Walter I. Hayes, of Iowa, from the Committee on Accounts, presented a bill providing clerks for Members, payment of the same to be made out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker [Mr. Carlisle] sustained the point of order.

On July 29, 1892, Mr. W. W. Dickerson, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted as a privileged report a report on the following resolution, and asked its present consideration:

"Whereas Fred Rice has served as special messenger to the Committee on Agriculture without pay since February 1: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be instructed to place his name upon the laborers' roll, and that the same Fred Rice be paid out of the contingent fund for services rendered from February 1 to April 1, inclusive, at the rate of $2 per day."

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that the resolution requiring an expenditure out of an appropriation already made must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker [Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia] sustained the point of order, holding that propositions reported from the Committees on Printing and on Accounts for the payment of money out of funds already appropriated were, according to the practice, immediately considered in the House. But if the point were made, their first consideration should be in Committee of the Whole, since they are in the express terms of clause 3, Rule XXIII, being proposition "authorizing payment out of appropriations already made."

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen wishing to converse will retire to the cloak room.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution again reported.

Without objection the resolution was again reported.

Mr. BARTLETT. On March 2, 1893, Mr. Harry W. Rusk, from Maryland, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a privileged report on the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to John W. Almarade, the father of Ernest Almarade, deceased, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of the salary being paid to him at the time of his death.

And so forth.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that the resolution should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker, Mr. Crisp, sustained the point of order.

Now, it is true, Mr. Speaker, that during the Fifty-first Congress and at the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress there are two instances in which the point of order was not sustained by Speaker Reed. I raise the point of order because it occurs to me that it is in strict compliance with the rule, which provides that a proposition for the payment out of an appropriation already made shall first be considered in Committee of the Whole, and if the Chair follows the precedents that have been made by Speakers Carlisle and Crisp, and in three instances by Speaker Randall, he will sustain the point of order.

I care not particularly about the proposition now before the House, and I am content if the Speaker sustains the point of order and follows the precedents that have been laid down by the different Speakers when presiding in Democratic Houses with reference to this rule, and I will be content as to this kind of a resolution if the House considers it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

However, we have a rule here which provides that appropriations of money out of the Treasury shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole House. That rule is a salutary one, and I invoke the decisions I have read to the Chair in reference to it in order that as we begin this session, and as resolutions may be offered from time to time for the payment of money out of the contingent fund, or the payment of any of the money of the people out of the Treasury, they shall first be considered in Committee of the Whole, where it has been the practice and the policy of at least the Democratic Houses, time out of mind, to first consider them. This is done to protect the Treasury of the United States, to protect it so that the House may have an opportunity in the Committee of the Whole to consider the matter and to amend it, and not be confined to the strict parliamentary rules that apply to the consideration of questions in the House.

This particular matter may be immaterial. It is not insignificant, it is true, but the amount appropriated is not large, and, so far as I am concerned, I have at present no suggestions to make why it should not pass, but I have objection to considering propositions to pay out of the contingent fund of the House amounts of money, small or large, until they shall have been first considered, if it is so desired to be considered by any Member, in the Committee of the Whole House, and as sustaining that proposition I have read to the Chair a number of decisions made upon this point by the Speakers whose decisions and whose names I have called to the attention of the Chair. It is in direct conformity with the rule, which has been the rule in every House and is the rule in this House, that, although appropriations have already been made, as in this case, for the contingent fund, yet resolutions of this character shall, under the rule, not be paid out of appropriations already made until they are first considered in the Committee of the Whole.

I happen to know that the contingent fund had to be increased a large amount at the last session. I do not think that the appropriation for this was anticipated; it could not be anticipated, because at the time that the deficiency bill was passed there was no certainty—although there might be some expectancy of it—that an extra session of Congress would be called or would be in session now. So that it is likely that all appropriations made out of the contingent fund at this session must necessarily be appropriated for by a deficiency bill to be passed by this Congress. That is all I desire to say at this point. It occurs to me if the Speaker is to follow the precedents I have read of Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Crisp upon the identical proposition of payment out of the contingent fund, the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] would in time past have been decided as well taken. Recent decisions, however, have been to the effect that it was not necessary to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of such resolutions as that which is now pending before the House. The money that we seek to provide for in this resolution has already been provided for in an appropriation bill. The contingent fund has been provided for for the current year and also for the year which begins on the 1st day of July, 1911, and all that is sought to be done here is to direct the expenditure of that money which has already been appropriated by this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is to be a payment out of the appropriations already made.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The rule which I read to the Chair as part of Rule XXIII contains the clause:

> Or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made.

As I understand, the gentleman says the rule does not apply, because this resolution provides for payment out of appropriations already made, although the real rule says:

> Or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this is not a new question. The gentleman from Georgia very properly stated, in closing his remarks, that he must rely upon decisions that have been made in years gone by. Recent decisions made by Mr. Speaker Reed and by Mr. Speaker CANNON have been to the effect that it was not necessary to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman cite decisions made by Mr. Speaker CANNON?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker CANNON has followed the decisions of Mr. Speaker Reed. Mr. Speaker Reed's decisions are several in number.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I stated that.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I read from Hinds' Precedents, on page 1060, section 4867, volume 4:

> On December 18, 1896, Mr. Benjamin B. Odell, jr., of New York, from the Committee on Accounts, reported resolutions authorizing the employment of additional folders at stated compensation, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and also authorizing other payments out of the same fund.
>
> Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made the point of order that the resolutions should be considered in Committee of the Whole.
>
> The Speaker said:
> "The Chair thinks recent rulings have been the other way. This is out of the contingent fund of the House, is a part of its expenditures, and does not affect the United States beyond that."

That has been the decision by which this House has been governed for a number of years past. I have nothing further to say. It is true that there was a time, a number of years ago, when an adverse decision was made.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, does the Chair desire to hear further? I desire simply to state that as far as I am concerned, construing for myself the rule, which in plain language provides for both instances where appropriations have not been made for payment out of appropriations already made, I prefer to follow the precedents set by John G. Carlisle and by Charles F. Crisp in determining parliamentary questions and deciding the construction of rules than to follow that of even so illustrious a Republican as Thomas B. Reed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the amount involved in the pending matter is small but that fact has no sort of relation to the merits of the proposition of order. I have not heard as yet anyone cite in the course of this discussion advance reason in support of the later ruling that can be relied upon to overthrow the precedents cited by the gentleman from Georgia, and overthrow the point of order which he has raised. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, that anything can be clearer than the language of the rule in regard to a proposition authorizing a payment out of an appropriation already made. It is conceded that in this instance the appropriation has been made. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri is a proposition to authorize payment out of this appropriation. Upon what conceivable view can it be held that this proposition, which clearly comes within the rule requiring that payment out of an appropriation already made, should be first considered in the Committee of the Whole should not follow the plain requirements of the rule, and be considered in that committee? Sound reason and plain common sense support the former rulings, and no reason has been offered to support the later rulings which are relied upon to overrule the antecedent precedents. When reason supports parliamentary precedents those precedents should be followed as against later precedents not so well supported, or not supported at all, in reason. When a proposition is presented which challenges the later ruling and that proposition is in conformity with the plain language of the rules of this House, that proposition should be sustained, and the erroneous precedent reversed. The language of the rule is so clear that there can be no difference of opinion as to its meaning. Here is the rule: All propositions authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole. See Rule 23, subsection 3. As I have said, the amount involved here is small, but we may have propositions hereafter involving amounts of such magnitude, that we would appropriately desire to consider the questions relating to them in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore at this time, and in this connection the ruling of the Chair on this point of order is a matter of some interest to the House, and I submit anew as I have submitted heretofore, that whatever may be said as to the existence of later rulings by recent Speakers, every consideration of sound reason is with those Speakers who ruled theretofore that such a proposition as has been submitted to-day, should in conformity with the rules, be referred to the Committee of the Whole for consideration, and disposition.

The SPEAKER. This is one of the happy situations in which the Chair can cite great names on both sides of the proposition. If it were an original question, the present occupant of the chair would hold that the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia was well taken, but for the last 10 or 15 years resolutions similar to this one have been considered in the House with the universal acquiescence of Members on both sides. Therefore, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the House is similar to that which has been presented at the beginning of every session of Congress for several years. It provides simply for a clerk to the Committee on Useless Papers at a salary of $6 per day during the session, and also provides a messenger for that committee at a salary of $60 per month. This committee is an exceedingly important committee, and a clerk is a very necessary adjunct to that committee.

The committee is charged with the responsible duty of going to the departments and ascertaining what papers are useless, and the determination of this committee is final as to whether papers are useless or not. The clerk of the committee must necessarily be charged very largely with the work of that committee, because it will devolve upon him to investigate carefully the papers that are presented and to report to the committee whether the papers shall be destroyed or not. In my judgment it requires a very high-class man to perform properly the duties of the clerk of this committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. It is a $6 a day place, and it seems to me that $6 a day is not an unreasonable compensation for an expert—and it ought to be an expert—who passes upon the question as to whether papers in the departments shall be destroyed or not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This committee heretofore has been allotted a clerk out of the nine clerks provided in the legislative bill.

Mr. LLOYD. I beg your pardon. The gentleman from New York is mistaken. There are nine places beside this. There are 10 session clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York is not mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have the record here, and it contains a resolution from the Committee on Accounts distributing the clerks for the session, carried in the legislative bill. I simply wish to say this: If the Committee on Accounts proposes to take care of these committees out of the contingent fund, there will be no reason for the Committee on Appropriations to retain in a bill which will be called up in a little while the nine clerks similar to the nine carried in the legislative bill, and there should be some understanding of what the Committee on Accounts proposes to do.

Mr. LLOYD. If it be true that it is included in your bill, there is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Accounts to press this resolution, because, as I stated to the gentleman privately, we would consider it a personal favor if it were carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not carried as a personal favor I will say to the gentleman from Missouri. It was carried there because it had been carried there for 34 years, and was believed by both the gentleman from Missouri, myself, and the Committee on Appropriations to be required for the efficient conduct of the public business.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not wish to be understood that I asked you to do anything as a personal favor to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that, but the statement of the gentleman might be misunderstood. The practice has been for these clerks to be carried in an appropriation bill and to be allotted to the various committees under resolution from the Committee on Accounts, and it seems to me that until the House determines whether it will provide for these nine clerks for the balance of this fiscal year, it would be wise for the gentleman from Missouri to await the action of the House.

Mr. LLOYD. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] intends to follow at once with the appropriation bill, I have no objection at the present time to asking to withhold consideration of this resolution until after the appropriation bill has been considered.

Mr. MANN. Before you do that, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes of time.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has already suggested that we postpone the consideration of the pending resolution until after another matter has been disposed of. I would suggest to my friend from Missouri that we postpone the consideration of all of these propositions in the House until we have really given them consideration in committee.

The gentleman stated a moment ago that this resolution was the usual one. On that he is mistaken. There never has been such a resolution passed before. It is true that the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers has had a clerk, and that for the last few years it has had a janitor and messenger. Formerly it had a janitor in connection with another committee, but when it was moved out of this building to the other building the chairman of the committee finally got a janitor provided for that committee. And there was a resolution at the last Congress to give a janitor or messenger to this committee, and I do not doubt that the committee needs one. But as to the clerk, what was the situation? The legislative bill for years has carried the provision for nine session committee clerks, and at the beginning of each session the Committee on Accounts has brought in a resolution distributing those session clerks to the nine different committees. What were the committees that had these session clerks in the last Congress? They were the Committee on Manufacturers—which has been abolished—the Committee on Education, and the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers—for which it is now proposed to provide an additional clerk—the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, the Committee on the Militia—which has been abolished—and the Committee on Mines and Mining——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, which has been abolished, and——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will wait for a moment; the Committee on Railways and Canals, and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. Of the nine committees which have these nine legislative clerks heretofore, three have been abolished, and the joint resolution would provide an additional clerk outside of the nine, although this committee has formerly had one.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman certainly has not read this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman has read it.

Mr. LLOYD. There is no attempt whatever, Mr. Speaker, to increase the force of the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers. Heretofore they have had a clerk and they have had a janitor. We ask that they now have a clerk and a janitor. We are asking nothing new.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the point is this: Formerly they had a clerk out of the nine carried in the legislative bill. Those nine are still carried in the legislative bill. They are carried in the bill reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] from the Committee on Appropriations. Now it is proposed to provide for an additional clerk, in addition to the nine carried in the legislative bill, in the bill reported by the gentleman from New York, so as to provide for an additional clerk, although three of the committees which had these clerks before have been abolished. That is economy for you!

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Now, I read in the resolution——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Yes; certainly, certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman from Illinois wants to be accurate.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is accurate.

Mr. LLOYD. I call attention to the resolution which was formerly introduced:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House compensation at the rate, respectively, of $6 per day and $60 per month for the services of a clerk and messenger to the Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers from the time such clerk and messenger entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of said committee.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Missouri suggests that I should be accurate. I am accurate. I am not reading from a published book; I am examining the records themselves.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more if he desires it.

Mr. MANN. I want only a minute. The resolution which was passed before expressly and only referred to the janitors, and the resolution passed with reference to the clerks was for the assignment of the nine clerks carried in the legislative bill, payable out of the contingent fund. This is an additional clerk, payable out of the contingent fund. Now, when you have abolished three committees out of those that had the nine clerks, what on earth do you want to provide an additional clerk for in addition to the nine you had before? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I read a moment ago the resolution that was offered at the beginning of the Sixty-first Congress, which is a resolution framed almost in the exact words of the resolution offered now. The gentleman is certainly not fair to this House when he undertakes to convey the idea here that never before had such a resolution been offered to this body.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that this resolution be temporarily set aside.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his resolution be temporarily set aside.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. LLOYD. I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. That is practically the same thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the resolution which he offered.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution No. 1. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 1, to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and call up all four of his resolutions in that committee without going through a separate procedure to go into Committee of the Whole on each one of them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to modify the motion, so as to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills and joint resolutions on the Union Calendar reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills and joint resolutions on the Union Calendar, reported by the Committee on Appropriations, with Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland in the chair.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland took the chair amid general applause.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I call up House joint resolution 1, to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of said act as appropriates $30,000 for an electric lighting plant, including the enlargement of the power house and one new boiler at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak., is repealed.

The appropriation made in said act for analysing and testing of the coals, lignites, ores, and other mineral fuel substances belonging to or for the use of the United States is reduced from $135,000 to $100,000.

The appropriation made in said act for protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash., is reduced from $5,400 to $5,000.

So much of the general deficiency appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, as appropriates the sum of $500 to reimburse the State board of regents of the University of Idaho for the premium paid on an indemnity bond is repealed.

The Post Office appropriation act, approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of said act as appropriates the sum of $50,000 for expenses of or authorizes the appointment of a commission to inquire and report touching the cost to the Government of the transportation of all classes of second-class mail matter is repealed.

The appropriation made in said act for travel allowance to railway postal clerks is reduced from $1,750,000 to $769,000.

So much of said act as authorizes the Postmaster General to allow railway postal clerks and the employees of the mail-lock and mail-bag repair shops an annual vacation of 30 days with pay is repealed.

The naval appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, is amended as follows:

So much of the paragraph appropriating for "Contingent, Navy," in said act as reads as follows:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of 90 per cent of the value of work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient, and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made, provided that partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for, and then only in accordance with contract provisions," is repealed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, during the closing hours of the last session of Congress a condition existed in the enactment of legislation which had been unprecedented in many years. Some of the appropriation bills were not presented to both houses for final enactment until the morning of the 4th of March. As a result of the conditions which existed it was impossible to compare some of the appropriation bills, and in other instances the comparison was made so hastily that errors were made, as a result of which items were enrolled to which the two Houses had not given their assent.

The importance of having the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress beyond any suspicion and the integrity of our proceedings beyond question resulted in the introduction of this joint resolution.

Three errors were made in the sundry civil bill, one in the deficiency bill, three in the Post Office bill, and one in the naval appropriation bill.

Of all the departments affected by this legislation, the Secretary of the Navy alone sent to the Commitee on Appropriations a request that the last item in the bill, which affects particularly the Navy Department, be considered either as having received the assent of both Houses of Congress and having been enacted into law or else be considered upon its merits and amended in certain ways outlined in his communication. It seemed to the committee, however, that it was of so much greater importance that the proceedings of the Congress should be beyond any question and that the integrity of the proceedings be preserved that the most imperative thing for the Congress to do was to repeal these various items which, through error, were enrolled in the appropriation acts.

Unquestionably, these errors were made through inadvertence. It might be at some time, however, that errors of a similar character might be made by design, and in order to prevent any such occurrence at any time it seemed wisest to treat these errors as we have treated them and ask for their repeal.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the history of the item at the bottom of page 2 for travel allowance to railway postal clerks? As shown in the bill, the amount is $1,750,000, and the repeal reduces it to $769,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The item to which the gentleman from Kansas refers was a Senate amendment. In conference the Senate receded from its amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, the amount, $1,750,000, was a Senate amendment, and there was a recession by the Senate from that amount? Then, how did it become law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Through an error in the enrolling room. Under a misapprehension that that amendment had been agreed to by the two Houses the enrolling clerks included that in the bill. The gentleman from Kansas may recall that the first or second conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill was presented to the House between 3 and 4 o'clock on the morning of the 4th of March. The final conference report, as I recall, was presented to the House about half past 10 or 11 o'clock on the morning of the 4th of March. In the enrolling room—the bill had been set up—the paragraphs which were not agreed to were taken out so as to expedite the enrollment. Through an oversight this particular item and others were inadvertently left in the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the committee made inquiry to find out whether a change in the item at this time in amount will affect any ruling or regulation made by the department since the adjournment of Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I sent a copy of this resolution, which was introduced on the first day of the session, to the heads of the various departments which might be affected by it. I have a letter from the Postmaster General, in which he states:

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing copy of House joint resolution No. 1 of the present session of Congress, which proposes to correct certain errors in the enrollment of appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911. The errors were apparent to this department, and I beg to assure you that no action will be taken tending to defeat the purpose of the resolution.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

The same is true of every other department affected except the Navy Department. The Secretary of the Navy requested that the provision in the naval bill be considered on its merits.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have not had an opportunity of looking at the report. Will the gentleman explain the circumstances in regard to the appropriation in reference to Mount Rainier, page 2, line 6?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was an appropriation made by the House, as I recall it, of a little over $3,000. The Senate increased it to $8,000 and the conferees agreed to $5,000. Through an error the amount was fixed at $5,400 in the enrolled bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the paragraph relating to the appropriation in regard to second-class mail matter. If I remember correctly, when the conference report was agreed upon it carried an appropriation of $25,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that a joint resolution was introduced and passed creating a commission for this purpose and carrying $25,000, and that the item in the Post Office appropriation bill was eliminated by agreement. This item in this bill merely repeals the provision in the Post Office appropriation act and does not affect the commission created by the joint resolution.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I did not recollect whether the Post Office bill carried this item or not. The statement of the gentleman from New York is that it does not affect the commission or the amount appropriated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not affect the $25,000 carried in the joint resolution authorizing the joint commission which is now in operation.

Mr. COX of Indiana. But it only affects the appropriation in the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; under the law at present there are two commissions, for one of which there is appropriated $50,000 and for the other $25,000.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to state my recollection as to the history of this legislation. In the Senate the language such as is carried in the Post Office appropriation bill was inserted by way of amendment. It went to conference and the conferees did not agree, and it came back to the House and we thrashed it out and instructed the conferees, so to speak, to insist on a disagreement. It was stricken out and an independent resolution carrying $25,000 was put through. So that this is clearly duplicate legislation, and I am sure that the department does not wish it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

The CHAIRMAN, Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to inquire about the paragraph on the top of page 2, with reference to lignites, and so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House appropriated $100,000 for this purpose and the Senate increased it to $135,000, and in the conference the Senate receded from its amendment, so the amount agreed to by the two Houses was $100,000.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Has the gentleman any opinion as to whether or not the $100,000 is sufficient to do the work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is immaterial at this time. I happened to be a member of the committee which reported the bill, and I think the appropriation is ample. Even if it were not, it is of much more importance that the integrity of the appropriations be beyond question and that the provision should be repealed.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The Senate receded from its amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York the reasons for the repeal of the provision at the top of page 3 of this resolution, regarding the annual vacation with pay of the postal clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the same reason that all of the others are proposed to be repealed. Congress never assented to that provision. It became a part of the law through the error of a clerk in the enrolling room, and however meritorious any of these propositions may be, it is of more importance that legislation be enacted by Congress than by clerks.

Mr. SULZER. Then, I understand it was never agreed to in conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was never agreed to at all.

Mr. SULZER. And it got into the bill through an error?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Through an error due to the conditions that existed in the closing days of the last session.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, after listening to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that I cordially agree with all that he has said in respect to this resolution, and this, too, without regard to the merit or the demerit to these various propositions. Gentlemen, understand that in the closing days of a short session of Congress which makes, in the aggregate, appropriations of many, many hundreds of millions of dollars, with the great confusion that exists, it is wonderful that more mistakes are not made in the enrolling room than are made, as referred to in this joint resolution. The enrolling room of the House, and perhaps of the Senate also, has been wonderfully efficient. From time to time a mistake has been made. Of course, this is the law, but it is the law through a mistake made by a clerk, and, so far as I recollect, invariably under conditions such mistakes have been corrected by legislation like unto this.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. FRENCH. The report of the committee does not show why the paragraph referring to the amount appropriated for the University of Idaho is repealed, on page 2 of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was Senate amendment No. 9 to the general deficiency bill, and the Senate receded from its amendment; it was not agreed to by the House. It was included in the general deficiency appropriation bill through an error. There is no reason why it should be paid under such circumstances.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, I would say that the claim itself is meritorious, but I am willing to let it rest upon its merits, and not try to take advantage of any technicality.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is not taking advantage of any technicality. Those who endeavor to get the benefit of this legislation would be trying to take advantage of a technicality. None of these items has ever received the assent of Congress, and are simply in the statutes as the result of errors.

Mr. FRENCH. That is what I say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, we tried to hear over here, but we could not, what the gentleman's explanation was of the postal commission to investigate second-class matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the general Post Office appropriation act contained a provision providing for the appointment of a commission and an appropriation of $50,000 to pay its expenses. The conferees on the Post Office appropriation bill reported about 3 or 4 o'clock of the morning of the 4th of March, and an arrangement was made by which it was agreed that that item should go out of the bill or it would have been impossible to pass the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the $50,000 item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Later a joint resolution was passed providing for the creation of a commission and appropriating $25,000 for its expenses. That commission is not affected by this bill, but the provision which was erroneously included in the Post Office appropriation act is repealed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, as a matter of fact, the commission was twice created, with two appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Two appropriations.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this repeals one of them—the larger?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALL] was to be recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be recognized at this time, in view of the explanation which has just been made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at the last session the enrolling clerk, Mr. McKenney—and there never was a better enrolling clerk, in my judgment—came to me and other Members of the House on a number of occasions in the closing days of the session and said to us that if we did not hurry along the appropriation bills and the other important bills it would be simply impossible for the enrolling clerks to take the responsibility of properly enrolling the bills. It is not possible for any men, however gifted they may be, to examine everything at once in the course of a few hours' time. It was not anybody's fault, in my judgment, in the House or outside. The instance in reference to the postal commission is a very good instance. It was about half past 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, as I recollect, and not 2 or 3, as stated by the gentleman from New York, when we persuaded the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] not to make a point of no quorum if we would vote down the motion to concur in the conference report. We voted that down and everybody supposed, everybody possibly except the gentleman from Tennessee, that when it came back to the House it would come back precisely in the same condition it was, and it would come back when there was a quorum present. If the point of no quorum had been insisted upon at that time, none of the appropriation bills then not passed could have been passed. The enrolling clerks do this. They enroll bills in advance based upon conference reports, and there is no other way of doing it, relying upon striking out the item that is not agreed to in conference, and they have to be reprinted in the Printing Office hastily, without delay, and in this instance the postal bill was enrolled as the conferees had once agreed to it and in the haste, the final conference report not being agreed to until within an hour or so of the final adjournment of Congress, that item then reported in the final agreement not agreed to was not stricken out by the enrolling clerks in the haste of examining a number of bills.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show it was not agreed to?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the conference report shows it was not agreed to. The conference report shows that all of these items in this joint resolution were not agreed to. While they stand upon the law books as the laws and can not be attacked collaterally, I am inclined myself to the opinion that an adequate attack could be made to impeach the law as not according to the Journals of the House and the Senate, because these laws are not according to the Journals of the House and Senate. The Journal of the House will show that this item was not agreed to in conference, never agreed to by the House, and has no place in the law. Now, whether these items are just or not is not a question in controversy. The integrity of the proceedings of Congress ought to be beyond all question, and when we have made a mistake by certifying that something was passed that was not passed we ought to remedy it at once in some way, and the simplest way here is to repeal the apparent laws.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letters received from the heads of the various departments in reference to the communication which I sent them calling attention to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain letters. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 6, 1911.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of the 5th instant, transmitting copy of "Joint resolution to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911," and requesting suspension of action by this department as to any of the appropriations affected by the resolution until Congress may have had opportunity for the consideration and disposition of the matter.

In reply I have the honor to state that this department will suspend action upon the appropriation measures involved and await legislation by the Congress upon the pending resolution.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 7, 1911.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Your letter of April 6, 1911, has been received, inclosing copy of House joint resolution No. 1, to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911. You direct attention to the portions thereof providing appropriations for analyzing and testing of the coals, lignites, ores, and other mineral fuels of the United States and for the protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash., and request that no action be taken with reference to the apparent increases in the appropriations for these objects from $100,000 to $135,000 and from $5,000 to $5,400, respectively, until Congress shall have had reasonable opportunity to consider and enact the resolution.

In response thereto I have to state that proper instructions have been given to comply with your wishes in the premises.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE, Acting Secretary.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
346 Broadway, New York, N. Y., April 11, 1911.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Upon my return to the office I find your letter of the 6th instant, relating to the proposed repeal of the appropriation of $30,000 made by the last Congress for an electric-light plant at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and confirming the information contained in the letter of the general treasurer of the 8th instant, have the honor to advise you that no action in relation to the appropriation will be taken until House joint resolution No. 1 has been disposed of.

Very truly, yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH,
President Board of Managers.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1911.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing a copy of House joint resolution No. 1 of the present session of Congress, which proposes to correct certain errors in the enrollment of appropriations acts approved March 4, 1911.

The errors were apparent to this department, and I beg to assure you that no action will be taken tending to defeat the purposes of the resolution.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 10, 1911.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing a copy of House joint resolution No. 1 of the present session of Congress, which provides for the repeal of the provision in the naval appropriation act of March 4, last, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments under public contracts up to 90 per cent of the value of the work already done, and requesting that, so far as possible, no action be taken by this department under said provision in the naval act until Congress shall have had reasonable time to consider and enact the proposed resolution.

It is noted that the purpose of said joint resolution, as stated in the preamble, is to correct errors made in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, as evidenced by the conference reports submitted to and adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives, and it is realized that at the time of the passage of the naval bill it was intended to omit all provision relating to partial payments under Navy Department contracts.

Owing to the lack of time for deliberation during the closing days of the session it is believed that this matter did not receive the consideration it deserves, and on account of its importance to the public interests the department requests that the provision as it stands in the bill be retained and considered upon its merits as a needful piece of legislation requiring perfection by amendment instead of eliminating it because of its inadvertent enrollment as part of the act.

In connection with this matter the following is submitted for your information:

Section 3648 of the Revised Statutes, which is taken almost verbatim from the act of January 31, 1823 (Stat. 3, p. 723), reads:

"No advance of public money shall be made in any case whatever. And in all cases of contracts for the performance of any service or the delivery of articles of any description for the use of the United States, payment shall not exceed the value of the service rendered or of the articles delivered previously to such payment. * * *"

It has, however, been the practice to provide in the contracts for building naval vessels or the machinery therefor that the price should be paid in installments during the progress of the work, but under such contract provisions delivery to the Government of the work done was not effected as the partial payments were made. This practice is shown by the department's records to have been followed since an early period and is supposed to have prevailed from the beginning, but a statement of the principle upon which it was based and the relation thereof to section 3648 can not now be found.

Originally a reservation of 10 per cent or more was made from each installment and the last installment in entirety was held back until preliminary acceptance and delivery as a protection for the Government against the contingency of having to pay for any minor defects or deficiencies in the vessels or their machinery. Recently, however, owing to the great increase in the cost of the larger vessels, running up above $3,000,000, it was found that the customary reservation from the installments as earned provided a greater sum than was considered necessary for the Government's protection and added an expense to the financing of the work that had to be paid by the Government indirectly as part of the price bid. Therefore the method was adopted for all vessels of dividing the contract price into a larger number of installments to be paid without reservations and securing the necessary protection against defects and deficiencies by withholding the last two or three installments, as the case required, until preliminary acceptance and delivery. Payments are restricted to, though in fact they rarely equal, the value of the work already done, and further protection against failure of the contractor or loss by fire or other accident has been secured by bond with satisfactory surety, insurance, and provision for lien in favor of the Government on the vessel so far as completed and materials on hand, and by giving the Government the right to forfeit the contract and take possession of the work and the contractor's plant.

Inclosed herewith, for your convenient reference, is a typical form of contract for naval vessels—that for battle ship No. 35, authorized by the act of June 24, 1910—which has been marked so as to point out particularly:

First. The eighth clause providing for insurance.

Second. The ninth clause providing for the Government's lien.

Third. The twelfth clause providing for reservations to insure completion in all respects, and the return of all payments made in case of rejection of vessel.

Fourth. The fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth clauses providing that in case the contractors fail the Government may finish the vessel and charge them with any additional expense incurred.

Fifth. The twentieth clause providing for certificate or affidavit from the contractors that the Government's lien is paramount, which certificate or affidavit is, in practice, required with the contractors' application for each and every installment.

The accounting officers of the Treasury have uniformly acquiesced in the making of partial payments under said contracts, and that arrangement has had the support of the Department of Justice, as evidenced by opinions of Attorneys General, wherein it has been at the least indirectly approved. The department had, consequently, entertained no doubts as to the legality of the contract provisions mentioned, but recently the accounting officers of the Treasury decided that, under a contract entered into by the War Department for powder, the making of partial payments before delivery was contrary to the provisions of section 3648 and therefore illegal.

Apprehending that this rule would be applied to the contracts for naval vessels, the department, under date of the 3d of February last, addressed letters to the chairmen of the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives requesting, with a brief statement of the reasons therefor, that the department be given express authority, by a provision as follows, for making partial payments under its contracts, viz:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of the value of work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made: Provided, That partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for, and then only in accordance with contract provisions."

This paragraph is identical with the provision proposed to be repealed by said joint resolution, except the words "90 per cent of," occurring in the twelfth line, page 3, of the resolution.

It is not known by the department why, or at whose suggestion, a restriction of payments to a fixed per cent of the value of the work already done was incorporated in the amendment proposed by it, and after learning that such limitation was contemplated it again requested that payments be authorized not in excess of the value of the work done.

If such limitation be now repealed, the accounting officers would, it is assumed, disallow the payments already stipulated for in existing contracts and inhibit provision for such payments in future contracts.

Should such a situation arise, the Government would be exposed to suits for damages, whether the claims were valid or not, on account of nonpayment, as stipulated in the existing contracts, and it would be obliged to pay under future contracts the cost of financing the undertaking in each case. For the vessels last authorized this item, made up of sums ranging from $3,000 for each $500,000 submarine boat to $50,000 for a $6,000,000 battleship, would amount to approximately a hundred thousand dollars in excess of their cost under the previous plan of making partial payments. For these burdens no compensating advantage would be derived by the Government from the proposed repeal of the provision under discussion.

The department feels warranted in saying that the Government's interests have not been disadvantaged or jeoparded in any respect by making partial payments under the contracts for naval vessels or by withholding a reservation from each of such payments; that the cost of every vessel paid for in installments has been actually less than it would have been otherwise; that competition for the contracts has been enlarged and additional pecuniary advantages thereby gained; and that no useful purpose can be served from other considerations by limiting, as said act does, payment to a sum less than the value of the work already done.

In view of the foregoing it is urgently recommended that the provision in question be not repealed, but that it be retained and amended by striking out the words "90 per centum of," occurring in the 12th line, page 3 of the joint resolution.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The bill was read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EXPENSES INCIDENT TO FIRST SESSION SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I call up House joint resolution 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 2) making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the following purposes:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For stationery for Members and Delegates and Resident Commissioners, at $125 each, for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, $49,750.

For the following employees during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, but not longer than until and including June 30, 1911, namely:

For 46 pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press-gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each; 7 messengers in the post office, at the rate of $100 per month each; 3 telephone operators, at the rate of $75 per month each; and 9 clerks to committees, at $6 each per day; in all, $17,554.20, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, after line 14, insert:

"For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, to continue available during the fiscal year 1911, $2,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this resolution provides stationery for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners in accordance with the law for the present session of Congress. It also provides for certain session employees. They are the same employees as are provided in the legislative appropriation act which was enacted in the session of Congress just closed for the next regular session. There is nothing further to add, unless some gentleman desires information as to some of the items.

Mr. MANN. I would like a little time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time?

Mr. MANN. Oh, five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice, if I may have the attention of the gentleman, that the bill carries an item for nine clerks to committees at $6 per day each, which is the same number of clerks carried in the legislative bill for the regular session of Congress. As I recall it, this is the first time that there has been a bill carrying these committee clerks at a special tariff session of Congress. There was no such resolution or bill passed two years ago, and there was no such resolution passed at the time the Dingley tariff bill was passed, as I recall it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that in neither of those two sessions of Congress the committees of the House were appointed until just before adjournment?

Mr. MANN. It is a fact that the committees were not appointed at that Congress, and it is a fact that at this Congress the caucus of the gentleman's party determined that the committees should not work——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us find out whether I am mistaken or not. Time will tell. They have decided, in effect, that these committees shall not work. There is no intention that they shall work. Now, what is the fact? These nine clerks heretofore were apportioned to the Committee on Manufactures, the Committee on Education, the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Documents, the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, the Committee on the Militia, the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, the Committee on Railways and Canals, and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. Three of those committees have been abolished and the other six will make no report at this session of Congress, unless it be that the gentleman now happily occupying the chair, who is chairman of the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Documents—and it is proposed to give him another extra clerk, not out of this fund at all——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there anything in this resolution which says that these clerks shall be assigned to the committees the gentleman has named?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why does the gentleman state they are going to be so assigned?

Mr. MANN. I did not say they were going to be. They could not be so assigned, because three of the committees have been abolished.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman draws the inference that we are appointing new clerks for six committees.

Mr. MANN. I did not draw any inference at all. I stated a fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. I say to the gentleman that he is absolutely mistaken.

Mr. MANN. I am not mistaken as to the fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Three committees to which clerks in the past have been assigned have been abolished.

Mr. SHERLEY. As to the future he is quite wrong.

Mr. MANN. What do they propose to do? Do they propose to assign these $6-a-day clerks to committees that have not had these clerks in the past? That is economy for you. I am perfectly willing for that side of the House to have all the clerks it wants. I believe in the committees having clerks and messengers, but I have very little regard for the hurrah about economy and the abolition of committees to save expenses, and then provide the same employees for some other purpose.

The last Democratic caucus adopted a resolution providing for the abolition of these six committees, and if I am not correct in this statement—I was not present at the caucus—I would be glad to have some gentleman on that side of the House correct me. But I have what purports to be a resolution which, as I am informed, passed the Democratic caucus, and I think I shall insert it in the RECORD as a resolution of economy. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will insert it, because it is a good resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I say I will insert it in the RECORD as a resolution of economy, so that hereafter I may be able to call the attention of Members on that side of the House to the fact that they are not living up to the terms of the resolution.

Here is one instance: They say they propose to save $12,000 by the abolition of these six committees. The only expenses these six committees had were these three clerks and the clerks of these committees and the two janitors. Now, they have not reduced any of the clerks. They propose to appropriate for the same number of clerks that were appropriated for before. They may assign them to some other committees.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is not the gentleman presuming that the Committee on Accounts will report sufficient bills to take up the nine positions?

Mr. MANN. I am.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman justified in drawing that presumption?

Mr. MANN. I think I am justified in drawing that inference when the Committee on Accounts has reported a resolution this morning to provide an extra clerk in addition to the nine.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. If it is not intended to assign these nine clerks to committees, why do you want to appropriate for them?

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman that when an opportune time comes I propose to offer an amendment to this bill, not only cutting down the number of clerks but placing their salaries at $125 a month instead of $6 a day.

Mr. MANN. I am with the gentleman as to that. I hope that side of the House will be with him.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not further misrepresent me on the floor of this House as before.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. I do not think I did misrepresent the gentleman, and I certainly do not wish to misrepresent him.

Mr. LLOYD. I said before, Mr. Chairman, and I say now, that we do not want to provide two places for the gentleman who at the present time occupies the position of chairman of that committee.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. I would like a little more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Missouri is here, I want to say that a few moments ago he said this was the same resolution that had heretofore passed, and——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I said it was a resolution passed in 1909, and I read the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. The gentleman from Missouri will have time enough of his own.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, all that I ask is that the gentleman will read the resolution which I read.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I will read it and give the gentleman some information about it, which I do not blame him for not having. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

What was the fact? The gentleman read a resolution passed at the last extra session, two years ago, when the committees were not appointed, when there was no appropriation for these nine committee clerks, when there was no provision for the nine clerks such as is carried in this bill, which has been pending in the House since the first day and was reported before the gentleman's resolution came in; and at that extra session of Congress, when no committees were appointed, but when there was a standing committee created by law for the disposition of useless documents, there was a resolution passed giving to that committee a clerk and a janitor for that session. But as soon as the other session came, when the nine committee clerks were appropriated for, one of them was assigned to this committee. The gentleman proposes to have the nine clerks created and assign another clerk to this committee. If I am not correct, I will be glad to have the gentleman correct me.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I have repeatedly said that there was no purpose on the part of anybody to provide two clerks for the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

Mr. MANN. Everybody knows the gentleman from Missouri too well to believe that he would want to provide two clerks for one committee unless there was need of it. I am not criticizing the gentleman for endeavoring to provide a clerk for this committee. I think the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers ought to have a good clerk and a messenger. It has a good chairman. It ought to have the accompaniments that go with the chairman. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Then there is no difference between us.

Mr. MANN. Not in the slightest degree about that; but what I object to is the cry of economy on the one hand, and then an appropriation for all that has been appropriated for before, and then some in addition, on the other hand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois assumes, because in the past Republican Congresses have maintained useless committees and provided clerks for them, that that is the purpose of this Democratic House. Of course, in that he is very greatly mistaken.

In the legislative appropriation act passed in the last session of Congress, when the Republicans were in control, provision was made for nine session clerks for committees. These nine session clerks have been carried since 1877 for various committees of the House. They have not always been allotted to the same committees in every Congress, but provision has been made for them in the appropriation acts, and the Committee on Accounts have submitted their resolutions distributing the clerks among the committees to whom, after investigation, it was deemed advisable to allot clerks.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. At the beginning of this session it was announced that the majority proposed to save about $180,000 from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it did not make any such statement.

Mr. MONDELL. In a reduction of the employees of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that there was included in this sum of $180,000 the compensation of the clerks to the committees that were abolished. Now, is it not rather early in the session to begin to restore the clerks that were stricken out, or who were not to be provided for, who were included in the reduction of $180,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that the gentleman's question, or is the gentleman simply getting rid of something that was troubling him, as to what the Democratic House was going to do?

Mr. MONDELL. I simply ask that question. It was announced that the majority reduced the expenses of the House about $180,000 by dispensing with the services of certain employees. Now, I assume that included in that $180,000 were the employees of the committees that were abolished. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is quite true.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, the gentleman in his resolution proposes to provide for the clerks whose services were supposed to have been dispensed with in that economy program. I simply ask if it is not rather early in the session to begin to increase the employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not read the resolution or he would not have made such an absurd statement.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that these committees were not intended to do any work, and he asserted that a Democratic caucus had decided that the committees should do no work. The gentleman is very much mistaken. If he had read the resolution adopted by the caucus, he would have known that no such resolution was adopted and that no such inference could be drawn.

In order to concentrate the attention of the country upon this Congress and to place the responsibility for the failure to enact the legislation that the country demands, the Democratic caucus determined not that the committees of the House should do no work, but that they should not report legislation to this House until after the important legislation upon which the attention of the country was concentrated had been disposed of and until further action by the Democratic caucus; but it was not supposed that these committees would be organized, have bills referred to them, receive communications from the various departments of the Government, have resolutions of inquiry sent to them requiring attention, and then sit idly by doing nothing, instead of preparing their legislation to be reported to the House at the earliest moment when it was deemed advisable to present the legislation to the House. So the Committee on Appropriations provided for nine session clerks for committees. It will be time enough for the gentleman from Illinois to criticize these clerks and their assignments when the attempt is made to assign them to the respective committees.

This bill provides for these clerks until the 30th day of June. When the resolution was under consideration a conference was held with the chairman of the Committee on Accounts. I have no hesitation in stating all the facts in connection with these items. Prior to this time various committees on expenditures in the different departments have been useless and idle committees. I do not recall any very effective work that has been done by them since the Belknap impeachment back in 1876; but they have been carried along in this House and session clerks for them appointed at $125 a month. They have done no useful work for the benefit of the House or useful service to the country. It was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts that in view of the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus and the determination of the Democratic House to make a thorough and searching investigation of all the departments of the Government it would be necessary to supply competent help to these committees, and it was stated that if the clerks were carried in this resolution the Committee on Accounts would probably allot them to the committees which would undertake the work of investigating the various departments of the Government.

So far as I am concerned, I desire these committees to be thoroughly and properly equipped for the important work devolved upon them. Not in a great many years have these departments been overhauled as they should be. I have already supplied some of the committees with information which has come to me in connection with my work on the Committee on Appropriations, and which leads me to believe that valuable results will come from the investigations to be made by these committees.

If these clerks are not to be allotted to these committees, or some other committee requiring them, they should be eliminated from this resolution; but if these committees are to do efficient work, if they are to make the searching investigations that it is proposed they should make, they should be equipped with clerks who will be competent to render the assistance that the committees will require.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If I understood the gentleman, the object in including the nine clerks was to give each of the committees on expenditures in the departments a clerk?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the chairman of the Committee on Accounts stated that they could be utilized in that way, and that they desired to give these committees clerks at a compensation of $6 a day.

Mr. GARNER. In order that the gentleman from New York may understand the situation in reference to the Committee on Accounts I will say that they provided in the last Congress a session clerk for each committee on expenditures at a salary of $125 a month.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that.

Mr. GARNER. There were session clerks for nine other committees at $6 a day. If the gentleman is undertaking to provide committee clerks for expenditures in the departments, he is giving them $6 a day in this Congress when they only received $125 a month in the last Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But they did not have any work to do at the last Congress. It is proposed to make the committees now important and useful, and the chairman of the Committee on Accounts stated that if these nine clerks were carried they would be allowed to the committees which were to do this important and useful work.

Mr. GARNER. I did not understand it that way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood it that way, because I particularly inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts as to the advisability and propriety of carrying the nine clerks, and called his attention to the fact that some committees heretofore which had clerks assigned to them had been abolished, and the chairmen of others had made the statement that these clerks would not be necessary for their committees during the present session.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield so that the House may understand the situation? Is it the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate the money for the use of the different committees on expenditures in the departments—10 in number?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nine.

Mr. MANN. Nine departments and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. We have only had 9 heretofore, but we will have 10 hereafter.

Mr. GARNER. I say, was it the intention of the Committee on Appropriations that the Committee on Accounts should not give, for instance, the Committee on Education, the Committee on Disposition of Useless Documents, the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Committee on Railways and Canals, the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic any session clerks at this time? I asked this question so that the House might understand the situation, so that the Committee on Accounts will not be put in the attitude of refusing to assign these committee session clerks, but let it be settled to-day as to whether or not these committees are to have session clerks.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. The information I want is from the gentleman from Texas as to the comparative cost of a session clerk at $6 a day and a regular clerk at $125 a month. As I understand it, those who got the $125 a month are on the pay roll all the year round.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGZERALD. No.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is in error. They were session clerks at $125 a month each, and I propose at the opportune time to offer an amendment to pay these clerks at the rate of $125 a month, rather than $6 a day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that on last Thursday this House by a unanimous vote instructed each one of these nine committees to inaugurate an efficient and complete investigation of each of the nine executive departments of the Government, and that if those committees carry out the instructions of the House they will have to have not only clerical help of the kind suggested by the gentleman, but, perhaps, even additional help.

Mr. GARNER. There is no question about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the reasons I requested the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], this morning to defer pressing the resolution which he offered was for the reason I have already stated. After these nine committee clerks have been allotted, if they are authorized by the House, and it be then decided to give a clerk to some of the committees which hitherto had session clerks at $6 a day, and they were not included in the resolution allotting the nine carried in this resolution, it would more easily have been possible for the gentleman from Missouri to have explained the action of his committee and to satisfy the House about it; but I repeat, now that the gentleman is here, that in a conference with him the statement was made that if these clerks be carried, in view of the work to be done by these Committees on Expenditures, the Committee on Accounts would allot the clerks to those committees instead of the clerks heretofore allotted, and if there were one or two other committees which needed clerks at this particular time they would then be authorized in addition by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the statement that has been made by the gentleman from New York about the conference which we had. I think it is the disposition of this side of the House, and, as far as I have knowledge, the disposition of the other side of the House, to investigate these various departments, and if it is done, it is very necessary to have assistance in doing it. I have heard no objection from any source to providing the necessary help for that kind of work. I believe that every man on this floor will with pleasure vote for a proposition that provides the necessary clerks for the chairman of any committee on expenditures. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and myself, both anxious for economy, agree to that, and every member of the Committee on Accounts is in sympathy with that view. We want to provide these expenditure committees with every clerk that is necessary, and if one clerk is not enough, we have the courage to come on this floor and ask for more clerks to assist in investigation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have only one additional statement to make. In 1877 there were 21 session clerks to committees at $6 a day. Five of the committees of the House had annual clerks. Since that time as committees have been created or as their usefulness has departed the number of session clerks has either increased or diminished; and, in addition, annual clerks have been substituted for session clerks for a great many of the committees of the House. In the fiscal year 1909 the number of session clerks was reduced from 11 to 10, and 2 additional annual clerks were provided for committees. In 1910, while there were 10 session clerks, they were reduced in the legislative bill for the next fiscal year to 9, and an annual clerk was provided for another committee. So far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, it has no desire to provide these clerks if they be not needed for committees. They were included in this resolution upon my statement to the committee of what was clearly and distinctly stated by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts to be the intention of that committee in allotting these clerks. No provision is made for these clerks now until the regular session, which commences the first Monday of December next. This resolution provides the money which can be utilized until the end of this fiscal year, June 30. If the clerks be not allotted, then the money will not be utilized.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he has any other resolution that carries an appropriation to provide for this expenditure for clerks specifically.

Mr. FITZGERALD. None whatever. Unless it is provided for here, it would have to be provided for out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand the gentleman's idea was that these nine clerks that the gentleman does provide for here will be assigned to these expenditure committees. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts. If some of these other committees which had these session clerks require them at this session of Congress, provision could be made for them out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would like to say, if the gentleman will yield me about two or three minutes, right in this connection, perhaps a couple of minutes——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I simply want to say, as chairman of one of these committees, I am more concerned about the time the clerk will be employed than about what the clerk is paid. Now, it is the intention under the direction of the caucus that these committees shall get busy. They have never been busy heretofore, and it seems to me it illy becomes the other side of the House to criticize the employment of the clerks, because I have been a member of one of these committees for four years, and that committee has had only three meetings in the four years, and yet they have had a session clerk at $125 per month. Now, I am chairman of the committee to which I refer, and we propose to get busy and to stay busy until we have completed our work. This House only a few days ago adopted unanimously a resolution providing for this very thing and giving these expenditure committees the right to sit during the recess of Congress. Now, it seems to me that there ought to be some provision made at some time, so that, in case this work is not completed by the 30th of June, this work can go on and these committees may not be without a clerk; because, of course, his services will be indispensable when these committees are at work. I am not specially concerned whether the compensation is $125 per month or $6 per day. It seems to me these clerks will be the busiest of all the session clerks and ought to be placed on an equality with all the other clerks and their compensation either raised to $6 a day or the others brought to $125 per month.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that these clerks for the expenditure committees have been entirely provided for since the gentleman's services in Congress commenced?

Mr. HAMLIN. When I was first placed on the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department they had a clerk.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. They had a clerk at that session of Congress, provided after the gentleman was placed on that committee. These provisions for clerks for these expenditure committees have been only in the last three or four years.

Mr. HAMLIN. I said four years; I have been a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department for four years.

Mr. MANN. For three or four years, or some such matter. It was done on a statement following an investigation made by Mr. Littlefield of Maine, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department. The statement was made here by nearly every chairman of one of the expenditure committees that they were going to do, oh, a lot of work in that Congress, and we finally gave them a session clerk. Now, I suppose it will be an annual clerk.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; not the gentleman who now has the floor. We do not want an annual clerk, because I do not think we need one.

Mr. MANN. I am glad the gentleman says that, because I apprehended they might want annual clerks for those committees.

Mr. HAMLIN. In reply to what the gentleman has just said I will relate a little instance which occurred when I was first put on the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. I went in search of the committee room. I found it on the gallery floor in the center of this building. When I was seeking to meet the chairman, whom I had never met, I was greeted by a gentleman who said that he was the clerk to that committee, and I told him I had been assigned to that committee and I wanted to know when the committee would meet.

He looked at me commiseratingly, and laughed and said, "This committee is a dead committee and never has any meetings;" and he further vouchsafed the information that it had not had a meeting for 30 years. But he informed me that he was clerk of the committee, and I have in my possession now the records that contain the minutes of three meetings. I think I have attended all of the meetings of that committee, but have only attended three meetings in four years.

This committee has made preparations to get busy now, and is going to be busy, if I can keep it busy, during this session of Congress, or until we complete our work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, all the criticism which has been directed against the action of the Committee on Appropriations is much ado about nothing. There is no purpose on the part of the Appropriations Committee to provide two clerks for any one committee, and such will not be the effect of the passage of the pending resolution. The criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] might be well taken, should we pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and then enact the pending bill. In that even there might be duplication. But there is no purpose to pass both of these measures. Had we adopted the resolution offered this morning by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] such action on our part would merely have rendered it necessary for us to amend the present proposition by striking out "nine" and inserting "eight." This amendment would have put both the Lloyd resolution and the pending one in perfect harmony. As a matter of fact, the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is not before this body, and if we enact the pending proposition it is not likely that it will be returned to us. So I say this criticism is a matter of moonshine.

Mr. MANN. If it had not been for the criticism, they would have been both before the House and both have been passed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all. If we had acted upon and adopted the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri, then when this bill came up in order, it would be simply necessary for us to reduce the number of clerks provided for, from nine, to eight, and then both propositions would be completely accordant.

Mr. Chairman, it is the purpose of the Democratic Party, as it has illustrated already, to abolish whatever positions are unnecessary. It is also its purpose to provide whatever positions may be necessary, for the effective conduct of our work.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If I am correctly informed——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. MANN. The Democratic caucus provided for the abolition of a large number of policemen—34 privates. Can the gentleman inform us whether they have been abolished or not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am informed that this abolition is dependent on the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, but is it not a fact that the official of the House who has the power to appoint these officers can dismiss them?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not apprised as to that.

Mr. MANN. I can apprise the gentleman that it is wholly within his power to dismiss them, in which case they could not draw their salary.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman that if this authority exists, it will be exercised. There is too much of the work of your party for us to undo, to expect it all to be undone at once. In due season it will be overhauled, and the gentleman need not be exercised in mind. It will be done, and effectively done—you may be assured on that point.

But I simply wish to conclude what I have to say in respect to the action of the Appropriations Committee. We reported this resolution, because it was suggested to us, and I will say in this connection that our report was the unanimous action of the Appropriations Committee, that the work of the investigating committees for the different departments would be a matter, not only requiring time, but requiring on the part of those charged with the work, something in the way of skill, and in the way of technical knowledge. For that reason we desired to aid these committees by providing them with clerks that would be of service to them in the progress of these inquiries. Therefore, we agreed on the salaries that are included in the recommendation of the committee, in the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I understand we have abolished three committees that had these session clerks and janitors and messengers, and that at the Democratic caucus the Democratic Members took credit to themselves for reducing the expenses of the House $12,000 by that action. Now, if you simply assign these clerks to other committees—and this resolution provides for the same number of clerks—how will the "demnition total" of expenses of this House be reduced?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes. That is the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is a proposition that the gentleman may offer in the way of an amendment to the pending resolution if he thinks it is a workable proposition.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It seems to me it is a proposition in the way of an amendment. I do not understand, I will say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the situation is at all such as he says it is.

Mr. OLMSTED. The situation is this: That this pending resolution provides for just the same number of session clerks as were provided in the last Republican Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman, yes; but it will obviate the employment of the same number of session clerks payable out of the contingent fund.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no doubt there will be plenty of room found for a whole lot of extra clerks before you get through this session. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has already indicated that by his resolutions.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman from Virginia think it would be an appropriate question to ask of gentlemen on that side, why they object so strenuously to the departments being investigated and the committees being equipped with the proper help to investigate them?

Mr. MANN. Nobody has objected.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; nobody has objected. What we object to is the insincerity of the cry of reducing expenses. Nobody has objected.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to the fact that the resolution to investigate the departments went through by unanimous consent. There was no objection whatever to it on this side. So far as I am concerned, I do not care how much investigating there is. It can not do any harm and may do some good.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that the resolution provides for the same number of clerks as were provided for when the Republicans were in charge in the last Congress.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is what I understand.

Mr. GARNER. I want to state to the gentleman that he is in error as to that. The last Congress carried an appropriation for 12 session clerks at $6 a day and 9 clerks at $125 a month. This provision provides for only 9 clerks at $6 a day. It provides for 3 clerks less at $6 a day and 9 clerks at $125 a month.

Mr. OLMSTED. If there is any reduction involved in a change from $125 a month to $6 a day, I am not good enough in arithmetic to find it. I think it is an increase.

Mr. GARNER. There is a reduction of all the $125 clerks and a reduction of three at $6 a day. For instance, there was at the last Congress a session clerk, at $6 a day, on the Committee on Manufactures. There was a session clerk on the Committee on Education at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Documents at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Militia at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Mines and Mining at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Railways and Canals at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Pacific Railroads at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims at $6 a day. There was a session clerk to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic at $6 a day, and there was a session clerk to each of the nine committees on expenditures in the different departments at $125 a month, in addition to those I have mentioned——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. One hundred and twenty-five dollars a month each.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. Now this appropriation bill provides for only 9 clerks at $6 a day, in lieu of the 12 clerks at $6 a day, and the 9 clerks at $125 a month, as provided at the last session.

Mr. OLMSTED. This appropriation bill provides for just the same number of session clerks as were provided for in the appropriation bill the enrollment of which it strives to correct, without any change in that respect.

Mr. GARNER. There may be the same number appropriated for in the legislative bill; but, as a matter of fact, there were carried on the roll, whether paid under the appropriation bill or out of the contingent fund, the number of clerks that I have mentioned—21 instead of 9, as here provided.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, may I say once for all, in response to all that has been said on that side, that every committee that has been abolished will remain abolished, and that every clerk heretofore carried for one of those abolished committees, will be abolished. The appropriation for the clerks in this bill has no relation whatever to the clerks for the committees that have been wiped out. I hope I make myself sufficiently clear in that connection. This appropriation, as has been pointed out, is simply to enable us to give the committees expert clerks, for the purpose of enabling them to do the work of the character that is to be done. That is the whole purpose of the resolution.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Whether it is not a fact that in the extra session of Congress which passed the Dingley tariff bill, and in the extra session of Congress which passed the Payne tariff bill, there were no session clerks appointed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a fact, and it is also a fact that there were no committees appointed until a day or two before the adjournment of each of those sessions of Congress, a fact which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has probably overlooked.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am quite aware of that fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were do-nothing sessions, and so far as the country was concerned the only thing they did was to pass two infamous tariff bills, and it was because of the passage of the last one that the country sent the present Democratic majority to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. The country has prospered under those two bills as it never prospered before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The country did not seem to have that opinion last fall. In this Congress all of the committees have been appointed, and they are all going to do effective and useful work. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. They are not, not one of them, permitted by the Democratic caucus to make a report.

Mr. JAMES. It would have been a heap better if your committees had been under the same rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not even state accurately what the Democratic caucus has determined, although it has been twice stated by myself on the floor.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Whether, in the gentleman's opinion, it is expected that these nine clerks are necessary to be assigned to the Expenditure Committees at this session?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the information which has been given to me.

Mr. MANN. I suppose, then, there will be no other assignments out of the contingent fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no authority to make any such statement as that.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman has no authority to speak for the contingent fund, and yet the gentleman is, in the main, in charge of matters of appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state again, so there will be no misunderstanding: The chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. LLOYD] made this statement, that if these nine clerks were carried in this bill and the money was made available until the 30th of June, the Committee on Accounts would allot these clerks to the nine Committees on Expenditures in the Departments, and if any of the committees which heretofore had had clerks of this character could show the necessity for having clerks during this session they would be taken care of out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Committee on Accounts, as I understand it, has ordered reported a resolution to provide committee clerks for the expenditure committees, payable out of the contingent fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what the committee has authorized unless it has actually made a report.

Mr. LLOYD. The misfortune in connection with all this matter is the fact that there has been very great confusion in the minds of all of us about the salaries of these various session clerks. I confess at the time I had the conference with the gentleman from New York that I had the impression that the clerks on the Committees on Expenditures had previously been receiving $6 a day. I find on investigation that heretofore they have received $125 a month, and, just like the gentleman from New York, I believe they received $125 a month too much, because I do not believe that they rendered any service.

Now, this bill proposes that there shall be nine session clerks, and that they shall receive $6 a day. I do not suppose that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had in mind just what committees these clerks were to be assigned to, and I do not suppose that this side of the House to-day cares what committees shall receive the benefit of this appropriation, as long as the committee that receives a session clerk does the service which will be of benefit to this House and to the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is closed, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following employees during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, but not longer than until and including June 30, 1911, namely:

For 46 pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each; 7 messengers in the post office, at the rate of $100 per month each; 3 telephone operators, at the rate of $75 per month each; and 9 clerks to committees, at $6 each per day; in all, $17,554.20, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 11, strike out the words "9 clerks to committees at $6 per day" and insert in lieu thereof the words "15 clerks to committees at $125 per month."

Mr. MANN. Let us have the amendment reported.

The Clerks read as follows:

Page 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "9 clerks to committees at $6 each per day" and insert in lieu thereof the words "15 clerks to committees at $125 each per month."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment is not complete.

Mr. GARNER. The total is a matter of very easy calculation. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the present statute I want to call the attention of the committee to the committees of the House under the last Congress that had session clerks. I may say in this connection that nearly every chairman of these committees have already called the attention of the Committee on Accounts to the fact that they need a session clerk. I may say that I violate no confidence when I say that the committee on organization of this House has taken into consideration the fact that they will have session clerks.

Now, then, if we are going to give these other committees session clerks in addition to giving the expenditures committees session clerks, the appropriation ought to be made in this bill. If the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, of which my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is chairman, is to have a session clerk, then it ought to be included in this bill. If the Committee on Education, of which the distinguished gentleman on my left [Mr. LEVER] is chairman, is to have a clerk, it ought to be included in this bill. If the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Documents in the Executive Departments, of which the distinguished Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at present is chairman, and for which we considered a resolution this morning, is to have a clerk for his committee, it ought to be included in this bill. If the Committee on Mines and Mining, of which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois is chairman, is to have a sessison clerk, it ought to be included in this bill. If the Committees on Railways and Canals and Reform in the Civil Service are to have session clerks, they ought to be included in this bill. If the Committee on Election of President and Vice President and Representatives in Congress is to have a session clerk, it ought to be included in this bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It ought to have a regular clerk, an annual clerk.

Mr. GARNER. That will have to be considered later. I admit that the gentleman from Missouri and his committee have brought in sufficient legislation to justify him in having an annual clerk. [Applause.] I want to call the attention of the committee and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to what my amendment will do in the way of a saving. My amendment, if adopted, will give each of these committees the clerks they ask for, and will save in this Congress fourteen hundred and ten dollars a month from what it was in the last Congress. In other words, if you give these clerks I propose to these committees at $125 a month, you will save each month the sum of $1,410. At the last session of Congress there were 12 session clerks at $180 a month, amounting to $2,160 per month. There were 9 session clerks at $125 each a month, making $1,125 per month, making a total of each month's expenditure for session clerks of $3,285. My amendment would provide for 15 clerks at $125 each, which makes a total of $1,875 per month. I make this statement so that our Republican friends may see that we are keeping good faith in our proposition to cut down the expenses of the Government.

We do not propose to have a sessision clerk for the Committee on Manufactures, which has been discontinued; we do not propose to have a committee clerk for the Committee on Militia, which has been abolished, or the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, which has been abolished, or the Committee on Pacific Railroads, or the Committee on Private Land Claims, which have also been abolished. These committees each had a clerk at the last session of Congress at $6 per day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], if it were adopted, would have the effect of making the salaries uniform, but I doubt the propriety at this time of undertaking to amend this bill in this way. The Appropriations Committee has pursued the course that has usually been pursued in these matters. It has provided for these session clerks, and I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall remain as it now stands, providing for the clerks at $6 per day. Then whatever other session clerks are necessary can be provided for in the usual way by resolution from the Committee on Accounts, providing that the sum shall be taken out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What does the gentleman say as to this proposition: Will the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas cripple the service of the House in any way?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know whether there is any difference in the effectiveness of a clerk that may be employed at $125 a month and one that may be paid $6 a day.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If there is not any difference in efficiency of a clerk employed at $6 a day and a clerk at $125 a month, then, in the interest of economy, does not the gentleman feel that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas ought to be adopted?

Mr. LLOYD. I have not said it will secure the same degree of efficiency. It may be that you could secure a very much better clerk at $6 a day than at $125 a month. I do not know, but there is this one thing about it that I am interested in, and that is we shall have effective service. I am not concerned as to whether the clerk shall receive $6 a day or $125 a month for this short session. What I do want is that these committees, when they shall receive their clerks, shall use them and make them effective and useful to this House and to the country.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then I move to strike out the last word. Briefly, I want to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. I have listened to this debate carefully and attentively for the last hour and a half, and it strikes me the gentleman from Texas has solved the problem. I have no doubt, nor do I have any question in my mind, but that all of these small committees can get good and efficient clerks at the rate of $125 per month. There seems to be some question on both sides of the House as to whether or not these small committees—and I designate them as such for lack of a better word—will do their duty. That is up to the committee, and if we can save fourteen hundred dollars per month, as the gentleman from Texas figures out, without crippling the efficiency, without crippling the service of any of these various committees, it is in line with the policy our party has started out to pursue, and I am at a loss to understand how any tangible, sound argument can be made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. I believe it ought to become a law, and right now is the time to do it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the situation in the House illustrates a couplet of poety, which, if I remember rightly, runs something like this:

Oh, what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive.

Now, the gentlemen on the other side find themselves all tangled up and at cross purposes in the consideration of a very simple resolution relative to some clerks to certain committees of the House.

There is not a gentleman on either side who is at all disposed to deny to any committee of the House all the clerks that it needs for the transaction of its business; and, therefore, ordinarily there would not have been a word of discussion on this resolution, but it so happened that on the opening day of the session the triumphant majority temporarily occupying the other side announced that they were going to begin in the exercise of their new-found temporary authority to give the country a splendid example of economy, and by reducing the expenditures of the House $180,000. Now, I do not know who the bookkeeper of the economy book of the gentlemen on the other side is, but whoever he is, when this resolution passes, he should strike $12,000 off the $180,000, as that is the amount of this first item against the credit of the proposed saving of $180,000. The truth is the gentlemen understood that the announcement of the saving of $180,000 per annum would go broadcast over the country, and they would be applauded for beginning their administration of affairs by such a splendid example of economy, and they did not think that when they came in with these resolutions one after another to restore all of the places they had proposed to abolish that anybody would pay any attention to them, and so in the course of time, while having the credit for economy, they would have not only all the places that we had when we controlled the House, but a few more. Strange as it may seem, the gentleman from Missouri this early in the session has not only proposed to restore several places which were to have been abolished, but he brought in a resolution to provide for a brand new place that we never had before.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman from Wyoming permit?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from Wyoming has heard that statement contradicted often enough, and there is no excuse for him here making the statement that he has just made because I have offered one simple resolution which provided that the clerk who has charge of the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers shall receive a salary of $6 a day. Now——

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman is making a speech in my limited time.

Mr. LLOYD (continuing). And now he charges that the gentleman from Missouri not only wipes out the whole $180,000, but in addition to that he is asking that there shall be a new clerk who never has been provided for by law.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the trouble is the gentleman from Missouri is trying to differentiate between the intent and the fact. We have all heard the old saw about the road to a certain locality we all hope to escape having been paved with good intentions. The gentleman's intentions were all right. I do not think that he intended to provide for a second clerk for the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, but the fact is that had the gentleman's resolution passed, and had the resolution of the gentleman from New York passed, there would have been two clerks instead of one for that committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman did not intend to do it. They will create enough places, heaven knows, by intent, but this is one created through inadvertence.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in order to be fair, the gentleman must correct that statement, because if the resolution passes which the gentleman presents it does not necessarily follow that one of these committee clerks will be for the committee presided over by the present Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. GARNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact we reported to the country and, as he says, we proposed to save $12,000 by abolishing five committees——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask that his time be extended five minutes, Mr. Chairman, if he desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. That we intended to save the expense of $12,000 a year by abolishing those committees. Now we propose——

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I did not say that, that perhaps was part of the widely advertised cut of $180,000 to which I referred. I did not refer to the saving with regard to those particular committees.

Mr. GARNER. If I may be permitted, then, I will suggest that one item in that was $12,000, which was saved by virtue of the discontinuance of these six committees.

Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the figures——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman was very kind about securing me five minutes. Does the gentleman intend to use it all?

Mr. GARNER. Under my amendment you will save $1,410 a month instead of $12,000 a year.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question of whether the gentleman's amendment saves a penny or not depends upon how long the gentlemen on the other side propose to keep us here. If Congress is in session eight months out of the year, there is no difference between a clerk at $6 a day and an annual clerk at $125 a month; and Congress has been in session for years on an average of about seven months in the year. So, as a matter of fact, on the record we have been making for years past the saving in the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], instead of being $1,400 a month, would amount to, for 15 places, to about $3,000 a year. Of course, it is well to economize, gentlemen, but we will not reduce the billion-dollar appropriations of Congress very fast at the rate of $3,000 per annum.

Now, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, if I understand it aright, because I think you get better work and more efficient work out of a clerk who is paid the same sum by the month for the year than you do out of a clerk who is paid by the day and who feels under no obligation to do any work for the committee during the vacation. But the proposition that the gentleman's amendment is going to save any amount of money worth considering I do not think is borne out by the facts. And if the gentlemen on the other side propose to amend the tariff to the extent that they say they are going to amend it, we will not only be in session 8 months this year, but we will be in session the entire 12 months. In that event the pay of an annual clerk at $125 per month would be considerably less than a session clerk at $6 per day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] complains because he suggested that some one was criticizing the provision for these clerks. Why, there is no one in the House criticizing a resolution for the necessary clerks for the committees. No one has any disposition to do that, and no one has done it. The gentleman said that his party proposed to reduce the expenditures of the House, and were now giving an illustration of it. They are, but it is this sort of an illustration, namely, that whereas they have abolished three committees, they do not propose to reduce any of the expenditures of the House in abolishing those three committees——

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Because the proposition of both the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is to provide just as many clerks as you had before the committees were abolished. Now, how there is going to be any saving by simply abolishing committees and striking them from the RECORD, except the saving in printer's ink necessary to print the committee list, I can not see.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I made no complaint or criticism of that. What I said was this: That you were misapprehending the situation, and taking advantage of that misapprehension to create a false impression.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not misapprehending the situation at all. The situation is just this: The gentlemen on the other side, in order to give the country the impression that they were going to be economical, that they were going to save a lot of money, gave it out that in the expenditures in the House itself there was to be a saving of $180,000. Now, we know that no such saving can be effected and efficient work performed, and so we are well aware of the fact that as the days pass we will have one resolution in here after another, so that at the close of the present Congress the expenditures made by the gentlemen on that side will at least equal the expenditures which were made in the last Congress, when the control was on this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from Wyoming is a prophet, but if he is no more accurate as a prophet than he is in giving his reasons in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] his prophecy will not be realized. He stated he would support the amendment of the gentleman from Texas because a session clerk at $125 a month will do more work than a session clerk receiving $6 a day, because the per diem clerk will not do any work during the vacation. I do not expect that a $125 session clerk will do any work during a vacation, either; so that if all the gentleman's predictions are as accurate as that statement, they will not give him much satisfaction when he has finished.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to say——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just one moment. The gentleman has unintentionally misstated some matters in connection with this resolution. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] stated that if the resolution reported by the gentleman from New York were to pass and if the resolution reported by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] were to pass, then the Committee on Useless Documents in the Executive Departments would thereby have two clerks. I called his attention to the fact that such was not the fact, and it is not a fact.

The resolution reported by myself and now under consideration does not allot to any particular committee any clerk whatever. Gentlemen should inform themselves of the contents of resolutions before they attempt to criticize Members in the House or say what the resolutions purport to do.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Did not the gentleman from New York expect that, if his resolution passed, the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers would be one of the committees provided for, as it has heretofore been provided for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have stated three or four times already during the discussion that these nine clerks were provided in this resolution because of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts that that committee desired to allot these nine clerks to the respective Commitees on Expenditures in the various departments, and I stated these matters in such a manner that there could not be much misunderstanding about what I said. Now, if that is not the purpose of the Committee on Accounts, not only should the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be defeated, but these nine clerks should be stricken from this resolution. There should be no misunderstanding whatever as to what is proposed here. This resolution provides, up to the close of this present fiscal year, the 30th of this coming June, for the nine session clerks carried in the legislative bill for the next regular session. Inasmuch as the Committee on Accounts, since the conference between its chairman and myself, has decided that these Committees on Expenditures shall not have clerks at $6 a day, the nine clerks should be eliminated from this resolution, and the Committee on Accounts should bring in resolutions providing for session clerks to the various committees in the manner they have always been provided. This House can then judge for itself whether this side of the House proposes to make improper and unnecessary and wasteful expenditures.

The gentleman speaks as though these 9 clerks would necessarily be allotted to the same committees as were supplied with clerks in the last Republican House. I have taken the time and endeavored to point out that it was not the intention in reporting this resolution to provide clerks at $6 a day for any of the committees that had them heretofore under allotments made by the House, and I wish to say to the House now that whether the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be adopted or not I shall move to strike out either the 9 clerks provided for in the resolution or the 15 clerks at $125 a month, if the amendment be adopted. The adoption of that amendment would have the effect of permanently increasing the number of session clerks from 9 to 15. Before that be done, I believe that the Committee on Accounts should be compelled to justify the authorization of clerks to any additional committees that it proposes to authorize. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] presses his amendment, I am indifferent whether it be adopted; but whether it be inserted, or whether the 9 clerks remain, so long as the Committee on Accounts has determined that these expenditure committees will not require clerks at $6 a day for the balance of this fiscal year I shall ask that they be stricken out.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman accept an amendment substituting $125 a month for $6 a day, and not providing for 15?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I think they should all go out. This resolution provides the same number of clerks provided in the legislative bill for the next session of Congress, and if the Committee on Accounts does not propose to allot these nine clerks for the balance of this fiscal year they should not be appropriated for at this time. Clerks can very readily be provided out of the contingent fund as they are needed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman evidently did not understand my question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did understand it. The gentleman asked to provide nine clerks at $125 a month.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Instead of the nine clerks at $6 a day; in other words, a simple change of compensation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it would be much better under all the circumstances to have them all go out and be provided in the regular way.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] seems to misunderstand me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not misunderstand the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. I had the conversation that he says I had with him, but I find upon investigation that I was mistaken about the amount that these Expenditures Committee clerks received. I thought they received $6 a day. It turns out, on investigation, that heretofore they have received $125 per month. Now, in order to avoid this tangle I would be very glad if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who now understands that I was mistaken, would accept an amendment making this $125 a month for these nine clerks, and then there would be no misunderstanding about it anywhere. It is no reflection on the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that this session of Congress will probably run beyond the 30th of June, and no provision will be made during the period from the 1st of July until the first Monday in December, and if it is proposed to give these clerks $125 a month it would be much better to do so out of the contingent fund. It would be much better for the gentleman and his committee to bring in their resolution apportioning the various clerks to the committees when provision is made for their payment, so that they can be subjected to whatever criticism it may be the desire of the House to indulge in.

Mr. LLOYD. May I call the gentleman's attention to another fact which is exceedingly embarrassing at this time? The contingent fund of the House is very low. There is not enough in that fund to meet the current expenses, even without adding any expenses to it. There is at this time less than $10,000 in that fund, and the demands on it, according to the statement made by the disbursing clerk, will amount to about $18,000, leaving somewhere near $8,000 of a deficiency, and I am very anxious that this contingent fund shall be protected in every way possible to protect it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not unusual during an extra session of Congress, not contemplated when the appropriation was made, to provide a deficiency appropriation for the contingent fund; and all that would be necessary would be to provide whatever money would be necessary to carry this fund until the end of the fiscal year, but if these nine clerks are not to be allotted in the manner in which it was understood they would be when this resolution was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, then in justice to the committee they should be eliminated from this resolution. Regardless of what happens to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], I shall offer such a motion. If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, I shall move to strike out the 15, so that all these matters can be determined in the proper way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman also that he proposes now to strike out the 9?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall make a motion to strike out the 9 clerks, or the 15, if the 15 be adopted as an amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. You propose to strike out the 9 whether the 15 are adopted or not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has moved to amend by inserting 15, at $125 a month, instead of 9, at $6 a day; and whichever proposition is adopted I shall move to strike out. If the amendment is not adopted, I shall move to strike out the 9; and if the amendment is adopted, I shall move to strike out the 15.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Under what parliamentary procedure will the gentleman from New York move to strike out an amendment after it is adopted?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the procedure of Jefferson's Manual, section 464. When a motion is made to amend by striking out certain words and inserting others in their place, a motion to strike out the words is in order.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe it is, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. MANN. The motion is not in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, we will discuss that when the time comes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am personally inclined at present to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, although I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that his amendment only provides for 15 clerks where, under my count, it should be 17 clerks. I do not know what committees the gentleman means to discriminate against.

Mr. GARNER. I do not intend to discriminate against any committee. I will say to the gentleman that the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice has suggested to the Committee on Accounts that he believes that when his committee in the course of time has had an opportunity to investigate the situation it might be advisable to get the services of a good lawyer.

Mr. MANN. I think it is very certain that the House will never give the gentleman from Missouri a lump sum to expend for clerk hire.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say that it was not the intention of the chairman to appropriate a lump sum, but to provide for a clerk at a better salary than $125 a month, but for a less number of months, not to exceed the amount that might be required for the session clerk, and that he would get more efficient service.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman knows that that is impracticable. Now, let us be square about the clerks for these committees.

Mr. SABATH. We always are.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois, who says "We always are," knows nothing about it. He never has been the chairman of a committee.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have been chairman of a committee of this House for a number of years. The last two years I was chairman of a committee and we had three or four clerks busily engaged all the time. Before that I was chairman of Committee on Elections No. 1 for four years. Probably the committee did a few days' work during that four years; yes, it did more than a few days' work, but the committee had a clerk at $2,000 a year and a messenger at $1,000. It was well worth the Government's while to give us those officials. When gentlemen have served here for long years and acquired knowledge and information and influence in the House it is well worth the while for the Government to give them some additional help. The only way it can be done is by making them chairmen of committees and giving the committee a clerk. It would be a wise provision if the Government could give to the Committee on Appropriations more clerk hire than the average Member has. Some of these gentlemen who have acquired through experience positions as chairmen of these committees are entitled to some additional help, not because the committees will use the clerks, not because the committees have much work to do, but because the Members have the work outside of committee work which is of value to the House and to the country. The Committee on Education is a great committee.

Formerly, at one time since I have been here, it was presided over by Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, Speaker of this House more than half a century ago. I do not think it has had a meeting in that half century; and yet I would be glad to give to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], chairman of that committee, a clerk for the committee, knowing that it would be profitable to the House and to the Government for him to have that extra help, not for committee work, but for work which comes to him as a Member of the House.

There are other Members in the same condition. Here is the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining. They meet occasionally, and it is a valuable committee, but regardless of that I would give to the chairman of that committee a committee clerk. The Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic never had a clerk until out of the fullness of our hearts we gave to that committee a clerk because Mr. Sperry, the oldest Member of the House, over 80 years of age, was its chairman.

It was not because the committee had any use for the clerk, but because we thought we could profitably give to Mr. Sperry an additional clerk, and we gave it in the form of a committee clerk. The expenditure committees propose to work. I hope they will. I have heard that song ever since I have been here, but whether they work or not, I am glad to give to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri a committee clerk, which I know will be of value to the country. If I had my way about it, I would have kept the six committees that you have abolished and give to the chairman of each of them a committee clerk, to work, not for the committee, but in the interest of the country. Why, gentlemen here who receive a salary and allowance of fifteen hundred dollars a year for clerk hire, each one of them on the same basis, know that various Members of the House require more assistance than the average Member does, and this is the only way that assistance can be given. In the body at the other end of the Capitol nearly every Member of it is the chairman of a committee, including the members of the minority, and why? Because it is a method of providing help that is needed and is of value. When you gentlemen take credit for having abolished six committees you do not exhibit a great knowledge of economy, but a lack of legislative wisdom.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the substitute by striking out the word "fifteen" and substituting the word "nine."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting the word "nine."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do that for the purpose of enabling the committee to properly express its wishes. The substitute, being a substitute, would not be divisible, and yet it presents two affirmative propositions, one being the change from $6 per day as compensation to the clerk to $125 per month, and the other being an increase from the number 9 to the number 15. By the amendment that I have offered the committee will be able to pass upon both of these questions. Believing that the questions are such that each member of the committee can for himself determine, I will not waste the time of the committee in discussing the merit of the amendments themselves.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, just one word before the vote is taken. I want to call the attention of the committee to the effect of this amendment, at least upon one member of the Committee on Accounts. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is adopted, I will take it as the voice of this committee that it does not believe that these various committees ought to have session clerks, and I for one member of the Committee on Accounts shall oppose any resolution to give these various committees a session clerk. Now, I do believe—in fact, I know—that there are some of these committees that ought to have session clerks. The Committee on Disposition of Executive Papers ought to have a session clerk, but if you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], taking into consideration the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it must be convincing that it is the judgment of this committee that only nine committee clerkships should be provided, and that those should go to the committees on expenditure in the departments. Let us not misunderstand each other, but let us know exactly what the effect of the adoption of this amendment is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there have been a number of committees provided with session clerks never carried in one of these resolutions, but always paid from the contingent fund.

Mr. GARNER. Just so, Mr. Chairman, and there can be no reason why the appropriation should not be carried here, if you should have these clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They should not be carried here unless it is the intention of the Committee on Accounts to allot the clerks already provided, and which have been provided for a number of years, in this session of Congress to some other committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I want to call attention to the fact that I called attention to a moment ago. It is no secret, as I understand, that the committee on organization of this House has taken into consideration the fact that these committees that have session clerks now will be provided with session clerks at this session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I heard the gentleman use the term "committee on organization."

Mr. GARNER. I did.

Mr. MANN. I read the rules carefully, and I did not catch it. What is that committee?

Mr. GARNER. That is a committee the gentleman had no part in creating.

Mr. MANN. I had no part in creating any of them; but what is it?

Mr. GARNER. And I imagine the gentleman from Illinois will have no occasion to interview that committee or bring anything before it; but, if he will note, I was addressing myself particularly to this side of the House, that they may know the effect of failing to provide these committees with their proper session clerks; and let us not be misunderstood in regard to the effect of this amendment. Now, it does seem to me, gentlemen, that we ought to give these various committees session clerks. If they are so insignificant and have no work to do, it would be our duty to do in this instance like we did in the others and discontinue the entire committee. What is the object of having a committee of this House if it has no power to do work? If it has no work to do, then it ought to be abolished.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why can not we appropriate for these session clerks out of the contingent fund of the House just as we have been doing?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, we can do that. Certainly, we can strike out this entire section and come in and appropriate for them; but the chairman of the committee——

Mr. HARDWICK. I used the word "appropriate"; I meant provide for them.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; and in providing for them we appropriate for them.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Can we pay them out of the contingent fund?

Mr. GARNER. I was just going to remark, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has already advised this committee that the contingent fund of the House is at its lowest ebb. It is something like the Treasury of the United States, it is barely able to go from day to day, and there is no telling when they will have to come to this House and ask for an additional amount.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Very likely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were were—ayes 87, noes 11.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, commencing in line 11, page 2, from the word "and" down to and including the word "day," in line 12, and strike out, in lines 12 and 13, the words "seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-four dollars and twenty cents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twelve thousand eight hundred and fifty-six dollars and twenty cents."

Mr. MANN. I would like to have that amendment reported.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the Chair that the substitute as amended is the order of the committee.

Mr. MANN. We do not know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will be taken on the substitute as amended. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, may we have it again reported?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment which we are entitled to have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is not before the House yet. The vote will be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas as amended by the committee by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment as amended was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 33, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to amend, page 2, line 11, beginning with the word "and," down to the word "day," in line 12, included. Also, in lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "seventeen thousand five hundred and fifty-four dollars and twenty cents" and insert "$12,856.20."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "and nine clerks to committees at $6 each per day," and in lines 12 and 13 strike out "$17,554.20" and insert "$12,856.20."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LLOYD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 80, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "necessary," insert "That the charwomen be paid out of said contingent fund the sum of 75 cents per day each in addition to the amount they are at present receiving, during this session only, for the extra services they are required to render."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say a word to my brother Congressmen in reference to this measure.

A few days ago I came out of my office in the House Office Building late in the evening. There were a number of women there going around on their hands and knees, scrubbing the floor. I asked them what they received, and they said they received 75 cents a day. They informed me that they were required to clean up eight rooms each, and nine, if they could, each day. In addition to that they were required to do the scrubbing, for all of which they only received 75 cents each per day.

Mr. Chairman, I am a Democrat and in favor of retrenchment, but I am not willing to go upon record in this Congress or elsewhere as doing such an injustice to that class of people, as they are not, in my judgment, receiving fair and just compensation in proportion to work faithfully done, and I hope this committee will adopt the amendment which I have offered. Let us help the poor, needy, and deserving and go after the bad trusts which are playing havoc with our country and people. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the charwomen in the House Office Building receive $20 a month. A large number of them are also employed as charwomen in the Congressional Library. It is an unfortunate thing that women are compelled to work in order to earn money in such a manner in order to support themselves, but this compensation is very gladly accepted by them and, unfortunately, there are great numbers of them who are only too glad to get this employment. In the place of these charwomen we might substitute political janitors, who would not keep the building clean and who could not be located when they were wanted. It seems that the compensation for this service was fixed after investigation as to what would be considered reasonable and proper compensation for the class of work done; and, as a member of the House Office Building Commission, I have never heard complaint from anybody engaged in this work because of the compensation. I do know that a number of women in the District are very anxious and glad to obtain the employment at the compensation offered. I insist upon the point of order that the amendment is not in order, as it provides for payments out of the contingent fund and is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill and committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

MILEAGE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I call up House joint resolution 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York calls up House joint resolution 3, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 3—making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories, and expenses of Resident Commissioners, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912, approved March 4, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from the Territories, and Resident Commissioners for attendance on the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the mileage of the Sixty-second Congress is carried in the legislative appropriation bill. Under a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, made July 22, 1893, mileage is not available at an extra session of Congress convened before the first regular session unless specific authority is made for its payment by Congress. This resolution is in conformity with resolutions heretofore adopted by Congress in extra session, and makes available the money already appropriated, so that it may be paid to the Members who have been called here to an extra session prior to the regular session of Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will not be in order until the debate is closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories, and expenses of Resident Commissioners, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912, approved March 4, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from the Territories, and Resident Commissioners for attendance on the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. The amendment is not in order yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Congress," line 3, page 2, the following: "Provided, That hereafter Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories, and Resident Commissioners from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands shall receive mileage at the rate of 10 cents per mile in going from their homes to Washington City and 5 cents per mile for returning to their homes, to be computed by the usual route of travel.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would prefer that the gentleman make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this joint resolution provides that the appropriation made for a specific purpose shall be made available for payment at the present time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] proposes as a substitute for that resolution a provision which attempts to fix the rate or amount of compensation for mileage to be paid to Senators, Representatives in Congress, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners in place of the one making the appropriation available.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, is not this amendment in order under the rules that we recently adopted?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. The so-called Holman rule applies to general appropriation bills. This is not a general appropriation bill. And besides that, I do not know whether the amount of compensation provided by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana would be fair and just. This money has already been appropriated.

On a previous occasion I advocated an amendment to the law allowing mileage which would change the rate of mileage. I can speak frankly on this question, Mr. Chairman, because I am less interested, perhaps, than most other Members of the House. The amount of money paid to me as mileage at each session of Congress is not as much as $100, so that the amount that I shall personally receive is not sufficiently large to justify anybody in harboring the belief that I favor the expenditure of $145,000 in order to be personally benefited to the extent of my mileage.

The question of mileage was well thrashed out in the early sessions of Congress at the very beginning of the Government, and mileage was paid to Members, and the rate of mileage was fixed so that Members would be given different amounts, in the belief that the compensation of Members of Congress should be the same, and that they should also be paid the expenses they incurred in coming and going between their homes and the seat of Government. Eight cents a mile, as I recall, is the compensation or amount allowed to officers of the Army and Navy as mileage when traveling on official business. The amount allowed to Members of Congress is supposed not merely to cover the personal expenses of the Members in traveling to and from the seat of Government, but it is supposed to cover all the expenses incident to the Members bringing their families to Washington for the session of Congress. Where, in some instances, because of the very great distance at which some Members reside from the Capital, the amount allotted to them may be somewhat in excess of their actual expenditures, yet so far as I have been able to ascertain, a Member of Congress with an average family who moves from his residence to Washington for the session of Congress and brings his family and such household utensils, as many of them are required to bring, is not compensated more, or very little more, than his actual expenses. Until some committee of the House shall make an investigation to ascertain by proper inquiry whether the amount now paid is excessive, or what would be a proper allowance under existing conditions, it seems to me that what should now be done is to make available for Members who are assembled here the mileage already appropriated. If at the next session of Congress it is determined that the amount should be changed, then when the appropriation is to be made the amount can very readily be fixed at such sum as may be proper under all the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. This only makes available money already appropriated.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that it is a very difficult matter to change the opinion of a court when he has once made up his mind, and that it is much harder to convince the court, when he has once made a ruling, that his ruling is erroneous.

With all due deference to the ruling of the Chairman, I do not believe that the amendment which I have offered to this resolution applies to the appropriation that is sought to be made available for the present session of Congress.

The resolution which I have offered, and which has been read by the Clerk, provides that hereafter Members of Congress shall be allowed mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile in going to and returning from their homes. I can not understand how that can possibly apply to the appropriation made at the last session of Congress, which appropriation the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] undertakes to make immediately available. The word used in the amendment is "hereafter." It is not for the present at all, but it is something to occur hereafter. It does not apply to the appropriation made at the last session of Congress, but for the mileage to be paid to Members of Congress at the next session. Therefore, I do not believe that the ruling is correct.

The gentleman from New York spoke about the mileage allowed to Army officers and to Naval officers at the rate of 8 cents per mile while traveling on official business. I think the gentleman from New York and every Member upon the floor of this House will agree with me that that mileage is too much, and if I am not mistaken in the membership of the Committees on Expenditures in the War Department and Expenditures in the Navy Department we will have a chance, before the adjournment of Congress next spring, to vote on a proposition to cut down that mileage. It was not my purpose to speak to the merits of this resolution, but to confine myself to the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. One of my colleagues from the State of Washington pays about $500 a year more to bring his family down here than he receives in mileage. Does the gentleman think he is getting too much?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The family of the gentleman's colleague are not Members of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman think, then, because a man resides far from Washington City he ought to be punished by having a portion of his salary taken from him every year in that way?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It may be unfortunate that the gentleman lives in the State of Washington.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman advocate leaving Members' families at home?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman think a Member of Congress living in the State of Washington should leave his family at home?

Mr. COX of Indiana. No; I do not. I think the gentleman ought to bring his family here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman want me to pay that out of my salary?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do; absolutely.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then if the gentleman is so patriotic and wants to cut down the expenses of the Government, why does not the gentleman be fair about it and offer an amendment or a bill to reduce the salary, so as to put himself on an equality with the other Members of the House?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know that I am getting anything extra over the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman's patriotism is measured very largely by his distance from Washington City.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on the question as to whether or not this amendment which I have offered is in order, I want to call the attention of the Chairman to clause 2 of Rule XXI, which provides as follows:

> 2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

And so forth.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that under this rule, recently adopted by this House, this amendment which I have offered is germane, and is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That rule relates to general appropriation bills. This is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. In effect it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not a general appropriation bill; the rules specifically define general appropriation bills.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The point is made, Mr. Chairman, that this is not an appropriation bill. In effect it is because it carries forward an appropriation made at the last session of Congress and proposes to make that appropriation immediately available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to its being germane to the subject matter of the bill, the question recurs whether the amendment I have offered is germane to the resolution. If it is germane, it is in order under this rule.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman tell us whether this mileage question was brought up and considered in the Democratic caucus, and whether it was passed upon there or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can not give away the secrets of the caucus. [Laughter.] I will say to the gentleman, however, and I am justified in saying, that it was not. Now, on the question of whether it is germane, whether or not it can come under this rule, I call the Chairman's attention to section 17 of the United States Statutes at Large, Twenty-ninth Congress, volume 14, which provides that the compensation of Senators and Members of the House shall be $5,000 a year and that they shall be allowed 20 cents a mile going and returning home. What does that rule mean? If it means anything, it means that anything is in order that will save expense. If it is germane, it is in order, and it is germane because it seeks to reduce the expenditures of this House and to reduce the expenditures of the National Treasury.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand, the only effect of the resolution before the House is to make available now the appropriation for mileage which would be available next December if no special session was held. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. GARRETT. Is not the gentleman willing that we may go on and have it now when we need it [laughter] and then take up the question and deal with it when it comes to be appropriated for next December, when we do not need it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. The difference between the gentleman's construction and the resolution is that I do not believe the amendment I have offered will in any way touch the resolution of the gentleman from New York so far as making the appropriation immediately available is concerned.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I arise to a point of order, or, rather, to two points of order. First, the Chair said he would hear the gentleman from Indiana briefly, which he has already more than done, and, secondly, the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but he is addressing the people of the third Indiana district. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of the gentleman from Kentucky is well taken that the gentleman from Indiana is not talking to the point of order.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then I will speak to the point of order. To sum the matter up, Mr. Chairman, the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York seeks to make immediately available an appropriation made at the last session of Congress. I contend that the amendment I have offered does not in any way affect that resolution.

In other words, if the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, together with my amendment, both become a law, the amount appropriated at the last session of Congress to pay the mileage for the next session would be immediately available. But after that the rate of mileage will be only 5 cents a mile. I realize, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty a man is laboring under when he is trying to convince the Chair after he has already ruled.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I was unable to hear all that the gentleman has said. Do I understand that the gentleman from Indiana claims that his amendment is in order because of the adoption of the Holman amendment to the rule?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes; I think so; that is my construction of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not been convinced by the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, and he sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the various resolutions to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolutions Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and had directed him to report resolutions Nos. 1 and 3 back without amendment, and No. 2 with amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the resolutions do pass.

CORRECTING ERRORS IN ENROLLMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 1, to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, without amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY EXPENSES, FIRST SESSION SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 2, making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, with sundry amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments en grosse.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 3, making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, to report forthwith with the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Indiana opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am as it is now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment:

"Provided, That hereafter Senators and Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from the Territories and the Resident Commissioners from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands shall receive mileage at the rate of 10 cents per mile in going from their homes to Washington City and 5 cents per mile for returning to their homes, to be computed by the usual routes of travel."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit as submitted by the gentleman from Indiana is not in order. It is not germane to the resolution and would not be in order if offered as an amendment, and under the well-settled practice of the House it is not in order as a motion to recommit if not in order as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the passage of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, motions to reconsider the votes by which the last three several resolutions were passed were laid on the table.

AMERICAN RED CROSS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 38, to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 38.

Be it enacted, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to grant permission, under such conditions and restrictions as he may deem necessary, to the executive committee of the American Red Cross to erect for exhibition purposes at the meeting of the International Red Cross in 1912 temporary structures in Potomac Park or other public ground in the city of Washington, on a site to be approved by the Chief of Engineers: Provided, That the United States shall be put to no extra expense of any kind thereby and that the structures shall be promptly removed by the American Red Cross at the close of the meeting and the site cleared of all debris and put in as good condition as before the erection of the structures.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say where it is expected that these buildings will be placed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement is made by the secretary of the Red Cross that they will probably be placed in the vicinity of the Daughters of the American Revolution Building, where, I believe, the convention is to be held. Miss Boardman, the secretary of the Red Cross, after a conference with Col. Cosby, indicated that the buildings would be erected at a point probably in the vicinity of the place where the convention is to be held, or if that were not suitable, or, if it were deemed to be advisable to have it and the Army hospital exhibit building together, it might be necessary to put the buildings in some part of Potomac Park.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember that a few years ago we passed a resolution giving to the Railway Supplies Association, or whatever the title was, authority to construct exhibition buildings on the park down by the Washington Monument.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I made an error; it is in the vicinity of the Pan American Building.

Mr. MANN. It is about the same place; the Daughters of the American Revolution and Pan American Buildings are together.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I made the statement the convention was to be held in the Daughters of the American Revolution Building; it is the Pan American Building. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. FITZGERALD to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was, on his motion, laid on the table.

SETS OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 126.

Resolved, That the superintendent of documents, Government Printing Office, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the library of the House, for use in said library, 10 complete sets of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, including indices, of the Fifty-third Congress, first and third sessions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. FINLEY. The purpose of the resolution is this, that the supply of RECORDS of that Congress in the House library is very small, and during the present session there is great demand for them; in fact, the demand is greater than can be filled.

Mr. MANN. And has the Public Printer got them in bound form?

Mr. FINLEY. He has over 50 sets of each. If the gentleman will recall, the resolution only says for the first and third sessions. Of course we would like to have those of the second session, which was the tariff session, but he has none of them to furnish, but he has over 50 sets of the first and third sessions. It will cost nothing, and there can be no objection that I can see to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING, COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 125.

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and to have such printing and binding done as shall be necessary in the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. EDWARDS, indefinitely, on account of illness of father.
To Mr. CRAGO, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.
To Mr. THAYER, for eight days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GALLAGHER was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William H. Mayo, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

By unanimous consent, Mr. NORRIS was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers submitted in support of H. R. 16298, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. CANNON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of J. T. Kirkman (H. R. 25844), Sixty-first Congress, second session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRINTING INVESTIGATION COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following appointments to the Printing Investigation Commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FINLEY, Mr. BARNHART, and Mr. FOCHT.

TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I intended to call up the bill H. R. 4413 for debate to-day, but on account of the lateness of the hour I do not intend to ask the House to go into debate to-day. However, I desire to arrange the disposition of time and dispense with the first reading of the bill this evening before we adjourn, so we can go promptly into debate to-morrow. For that reason I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, a bill to place on the free list agricultural implements and other articles.

Pending that motion, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the debate on this bill be divided equally between the two sides of the House, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] be allowed to control the time in opposition to the bill and that I be allowed to control the time in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] control the time against the bill, and that he, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], control the time in favor of the bill, and that the time be equally divided.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any disposition at this time to limit general debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is not, on my part.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to know if the gentleman can tell at this time whether he has any idea as to the length of time that will be consumed in general debate on the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can only state that from the requests I have had on this side of the House, and assuming that there will be as much time consumed on the other side of the House, it is likely to take four or five days.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman this question, further: Will there be any disposition to confine general debate to the bill itself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a matter of the ruling of the Chair. Any gentleman——

Mr. NORRIS. Heretofore the ruling has always been that you did not have to talk about the bill.

Mr. MANN. You do not have to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will be determined by the Chairman when we get to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas will state his point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Rule XXXV gives the Speaker control over the official reporters of debates. Now, in the printing of speeches in the RECORD, speeches printed separately are annotated in two different ways by the editors of the RECORD. I call the Speaker's attention to page 448. In that case a speech is printed with this annotation:

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes—

Mr. So-and-so said:

Now, I call the Speaker's attention to page 450, where a speech is printed with this editorial annotation, a briefer one than the former:

On the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes—

Mr. So-and-so said:

Now, I desire to ask the Speaker if it is the practice of the official reporters of debates to use the longer annotation on speeches actually delivered on the floor of the House and the shorter annotation on those which are printed under general leave to print and are not delivered on the floor of the House at all?

Mr. MANN. It is not.

The SPEAKER. In the first place, the Chair hardly thinks it is a parliamentary inquiry, but will answer it. The Clerk informs the Chair that the headings on these speeches were put on at the Government Printing Office and the reporters had nothing to do with them. And the Chair is absolutely certain that the Chair is not going into the business of writing headnotes for other people's speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. We have no other source of inquiry except the Speaker in this matter. Then the House is to understand that this difference in annotation does not really denote whether the speech was delivered in fact or merely printed?

The SPEAKER. It does not, and the Chair understands from the uniform practice of the last 18 years, and to the certain knowledge of the present occupant of the chair, there is no sort of way of finding out from reading the RECORD itself whether a speech is delivered here or not, except where it is cut up with debate. That is generally the test.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then parenthetical applause or laughter does not denote it?

Mr. MANN. I saw a speech printed during the last session of Congress, where permission was obtained to insert it while I was in the chair, prepared so as to read that the "Clerk read so-and-so" and the gentleman's time "was extended so-and-so" and filled with applause. Not a word of it had been uttered on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4413.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

Mr. ALEXANDER took the chair amid general applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4413. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 4413. A bill to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, etc., and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, April 25, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DALZELL, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4413) to place upon the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, submitted a minority report (No. 4, pt. 2), which said views were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6823) for the relief of Pedro Fuentes, administrator of the estate of Guadalupe Lujan de Fuentes, deceased, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LINDSAY: A bill (H. R. 7024) granting pensions to widows and minors of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7025) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MILLER: A bill (H. R. 7026) for a public building at Two Harbors, Minn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 7027) granting the public lands belonging to the United States and situated in the State of Arkansas to the State of Arkansas for the use and benefit of the common schools of that State; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MORRISON: A bill (H. R. 7028) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint certain persons in the Regular Army and place them upon the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 7029) for the erection at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., of a monument to the memory of Col. Alexander William Doniphan; to the Committee on the Library.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 25, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Coaden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, when we consider the works of Thy hand, the vast and stupendous universe, and the wonderful adaptation of means to ends everywhere apparent, we are moved to wonder and awe; but when we feel the thrill of that everlasting fatherly love revealed in the heart of the Christ and poured out in agony in Gethsemane and on the cross of Calvary we are moved to admiration, thanksgiving, praise, gratitude, and love. But, oh, how soon we wrap the mantle of selfishness about us and forget our duty to Thee and to our fellow men! Forgive us, we beseech Thee, and help us to be true followers of the Jesus of Nazareth, in thought, word, and deed, for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF SPEECHES IN THE RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a few remarks about a matter relating to the printing of the RECORD. This is the only time in the proceedings of the House when a Member is in order in saying anything regarding the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to make a few remarks about the printing of the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. How long will it take?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not over five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for five minutes to make some remarks about the printing of the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I regret to have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. If a Member of this House desires to reach a matter relating to the manner of the printing of the RECORD, is there any other time when he is in order, when he can obtain recognition for the purpose?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order if he rises for the purpose of correcting the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. I must confess that I do not rise for the purpose of correcting the RECORD in any specific thing.

The SPEAKER. Then the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] shuts the gentleman from Kansas off.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman wants to correct the RECORD, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. He says he does not want to correct the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. No specific thing, but just the manner of printing certain things in the RECORD.

Mr. JAMES. I will withdraw my objection. Let the gentleman go ahead.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I pointed out to the Speaker that there were two ways of heading set speeches when printed in the RECORD, one by the inclusion at the beginning of the speech of an editorial annotation in one instance reading as follows: "The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration such and such a bill," and in the second instance, another briefer editorial annotation, which reads as follows: "On the bill No. 4412, to promote reciprocal trade relations," and so forth.

Now, I asked the Speaker yesterday if it were not a fact that when the longer annotation appeared at the beginning of a speech it did not indicate that that speech was actually made on the floor of the House, and if, on the other hand, when the shorter annotation appeared, it was not clearly an indication that the speech was not made on the floor of the House, but printed under leave to print. The Speaker said that in his opinion it did not denote any such distinction.

I want to say that I have since learned that it does denote such distinction, that the Style Book of the Government Printing Office sets forth that when a speech is printed under the general leave to print it carries the shorter annotation, and when actually delivered on the floor of the House then it carries the longer annotation. So, if the printers in the Government Printing Office carry out the regulations in their style book, which is as binding on them as the rules are upon the House, the country and the House should understand that when the shorter annotation appears the speech was never delivered in the House.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that the country would be so well informed as to the proper annotation as to make the proper discrimination so as to know whether the speech was delivered on the floor of the House or not?

Mr. MURDOCK. Undoubtedly the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is under general impeachment as to veracity all over the country.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It is not a question of veracity.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is absolutely a question of veracity, and I want to say to the gentleman that the average constituent in his district will very clearly see the distinction between one annotation and the other, and will be able to tell, if the style book is followed, whether a speech is actually made or is put in under leave to print.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. My constituents will never have occasion to ascertain the distinction, because I think I never printed a speech in the RECORD that was not delivered on the floor of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no doubt the gentleman has in his district quite a number who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They all read it.

Mr. MURDOCK. And they want to know the distinction between the speech that is not delivered and one that is delivered on the floor of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a speech which appears on page 447 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 21, with the shorter annotation which he says shows that the speech was not actually delivered. I want to say that I believe that was actually delivered, which would indicate that the gentleman from Kansas has not been correctly informed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from Colorado know it from his own knowledge?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not know it from my own knowledge.

Mr. KENDALL. It must have been delivered on the floor, because it has "Applause" in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the whole matter rests with the Speaker. He has control over the official reporters and he has control, with the Senate, over the Style Book of the Government Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Kansas want the Speaker to do?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like the Speaker to acknowledge his error in saying yesterday that the two different annotations did not indicate whether the speech was made on the floor of the House or not or whether it was printed under leave to print. The Speaker is in the RECORD as saying that it does not indicate a difference, and the style book says that it does.

The SPEAKER. If the Speaker said that, the Speaker withdraws that remark and states that he has since examined the Style Book of the Government Printing Office, and the gentleman from Kansas was correct. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Kansas. His whole argument is that the RECORD does not state the facts. It is within the power of any Member on the floor, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to call attention to an error in the RECORD. Why does not the gentleman, as a Member, avail himself of his power to call attention to the fact that where the RECORD says that a gentleman said certain things when, as a matter of fact, he did not, that the RECORD is in error and should read that under leave to print the gentleman printed certain things?

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does not the gentleman from Kentucky do the same thing?

Mr. SHERLEY. Because I propose to reach it in what I consider a more regular way; but if the gentleman from Kansas, instead of criticizing the Speaker for the nonexercise——

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I want to say to the gentleman that I do not criticize the Speaker.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is peculiarly sensitive about the word "criticize," but the gentleman from Kansas made comment on the Speaker's nonperformance of what he considered to be a duty. The same power rests with the gentleman from Kansas. Let the gentleman exercise it if he choose.

Mr. MURDOCK. Or any other Member of the House. All I would like to say is this, that as the matter now stands, under the style book rule governing it, this House and the country should understand that wherever the shorter annotation is used it is an indication, at least within the lights of the Government Printing Office, that that speech was printed and not delivered in the House, and when the longer annotation appears it is an indication to the country that the speech was actually made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask a question for information. Who gave the authority to the Printing Office to make any rules about the heading of a speech at all?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am or have been in the past a practical printer, and the rules made in the average printing office in the United States were handed down from an origin somewhere in Germany along about 400 years ago, and they are not susceptible to change by courts or legislature; I think they are susceptible, however, to a suggestion from the Speaker of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I knew that the press was very powerful, but I never knew it was so powerful as that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is it not true that this rule of the style book to which the gentleman refers is a new rule, and is not one of the old rules of the Printing Office?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am frank to confess that I do not know what the origin of the rule is, but evidently it is a very old rule.

Mr. MANN. I would say to the gentleman that I have inserted remarks in the RECORD under leave to print several times, and always with a long caption. The rule is a new one, if it is enforced at all. These speeches under leave to print do not need to go through the Official Reporter's hands at all. I would like to ask the gentleman how the Government Printing Office can tell if a man rises here and the RECORD shows that the gentleman from so-and-so addressed the House and that his remarks are held for revision, and then he puts in a long speech, how the Government Printing Office can tell whether the remarks were delivered on the floor of the House or not.

Mr. MURDOCK. As a practical printer, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that I believe the printers judge from the copy they receive. Of course I do not know how they decide.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas has had several years' service here——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting discussion, but it leads to nothing, and I am compelled to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

ADDITIONAL OFFICERS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I call up privileged House resolution 98, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the following privileged report, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 98.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives of the United States how many officers have been or will be added to the Army by virtue of the provision for the adjustment of rank contained in the act of March 3, 1911, and under which clause of said provision the number of officers added to the Army has been or will be determined.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not make a point of order against the resolution, though I do not think it is privileged.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order, and unless the gentleman asks unanimous consent I shall make it.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there a report accompanying the resolution?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House report No. 10.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report: The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 98, calling for information as to the number of officers added to the Army under the act of March 3, 1911, having considered the same, reports thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. Hay. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HAY. I do.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has made any other attempt to get this information before asking the House to adopt this resolution?

Mr. HAY. No; I have not.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman why it would not be simpler and save the time of the House if the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, would write a letter to the Secretary of War requesting this information? He certainly would get the information desired.

Mr. HAY. Because I thought, Mr. Speaker, this is information for the House itself, and is not information that should be confined to myself.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman could give it whatever publicity he desired.

Mr. HARDWICK. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is this proceeding by unanimous consent; has unanimous consent been granted?

Mr. HAY. It has. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

A motion by Mr. HAY to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was, on his motion, laid on the table.

TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, a bill to place on the free list agricultural implements and other articles.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements and other articles, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, and the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the bill has already been reported to the House and its first reading dispensed with yesterday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was simply reported by title.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means have reported this free-list bill to the House for its consideration for two purposes. One is that the committee recognize that the great underlying industry on which rests the prosperity of the entire country is that of agriculture. A bill passed the House several days ago that places on the free list, if it becomes a law, practically all the agricultural products of this country that were not already there outside of the citrus and semi-tropical fruits grown in California and Florida. It has always been maintained on this side of the House—and I believe it to be true—that the tariff on wheat and other farm products no more affects the prices of such products than a tariff levied on short-staple cotton would affect its price. It is not by way of compensation to the farmers that we have offered this bill, because we believe that the great cereal producers of this country are compelled to go to the markets of the world to dispose of their surplus products, and that such surplus products fix their prices in the world markets. We believe fully that the passage of the reciprocity treaty with Canada will not work a serious injury to any of the farming classes of the United States, but we also recognize, too, that, as a large number of the agricultural products of the country to-day are on the free list, if the reciprocity treaty passes this session of Congress practically all of them will be on the free list this year, and that it is not just to levy taxes on the tools of trade and the necessities of life that the farming classes must use and are dependent upon when they must go to the great world markets to dispose of their surplus products.

Now, one of the two principal objects of this bill is to remove from the protected list those implements of trade that the farmer must use in producing his crops. The other object is to reduce the cost of living to the masses of the American people by putting their food on the free list.

The putting of these agricultural products on the free list will in times of short crops prevent combinations from cornering the food market of the country, because supplies from foreign countries will come into America and break such corners.

The bill is not a long one. The first section provides for placing on the free list the agricultural implements that are necessary for the farmer's use. Now, I do not propose to discuss this question from the standpoint of a protectionist, because I am not a protectionist, and neither is my party composed of protectionists. We do not believe in levying prohibitive taxes at the customhouse.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me at this time. We do not believe in levying taxes at the customhouse for the benefit of any man or the benefit of any industry. Our position is that the taxes levied at the customhouse are for the sole purpose of producing revenue to support the Government of the United States, and that we are not justified in levying taxes for any other purpose. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore, when we approach the question of putting articles on the free list the sole point involved, so far as we are concerned, is whether the Government of the United States can dispense with the revenue derived from these articles.

This bill, if taken by itself, will probably reduce the revenue by about $10,000,000. The estimates in the report I have filed in the House amount to a little over $10,000,000, but I have endeavored to make full estimates, and I feel assured that the reduction of revenue will amount to less than the estimates contained in the report. On the other hand there is a reduction in the revenue of about $5,000,000 by the reciprocity agreement with Canada. These two bills largely cover the same articles; those involved in the reciprocity agreement and also in this bill effect a remission of duties to the amount of $1,653,313, and hence the actual amount of the reduction of revenue because of this bill will, in my judgment, be less than $8,500,000, instead of $10,000,000.

It may be asked where we expect to get the revenue to run the Government, if we are going to reduce the customs taxes and cut off the revenue from that source. I say to the House that when we put these articles on the free list we can not of necessity make up the revenue from customs duties on these same articles. This bill and the reciprocity agreement will reduce the revenue about $12,000,000 or $13,000,000. Now, if you ask how we are to make up that revenue, I state to you that we do not expect to make it up. We believe and are confident that in managing the expenditures of the Government and making the appropriations for the fiscal years to follow we can reduce the expenses of this Government more than the $13,000,000 of revenue that we have cut off in these bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not think there is any doubt about that; and we feel assured that we can confidently assert to the country that our reductions in the expenditures of the Government will amount to far more than the reductions in the bill under consideration.

The reciprocity-agreement bill and this free-list bill are not the only revenue bills we intend to bring before the House. As has been stated before, we propose to revise the tariff, schedule by schedule. We propose hereafter to bring in the different schedules of the tariff bill as we have the opportunity to consider them and present them to the House for its consideration one schedule at a time. We believe that this is the most intelligent way for the House to consider a revision of the tariff.

If we presented to the House at one time an entire tariff bill, there is not a Member here who served in the last Congress who does not know that it is impossible for the membership of this body to fairly and fully consider so comprehensive a measure when it is presented as a whole. But if we proceed by schedules, considering only one at a time, we believe the membership of the House will fully and fairly understand the scope of the bill, and at the same time have a full and a fair opportunity to act upon it.

Now, as to the question of revenue in the other schedules, the Democratic Party, as I have said before, does not stand for the wiping out of the customhouses. We expect to raise the necessary revenue to run this Government at the customhouses, but we contend that in many of the schedules and many of the items in the tariff law now on the statute books the rates are prohibitory and prevent the importation of goods from abroad, as well as a fair and reasonable competition.

And it is not necessary to say that when you build your tariff wall so high that foreign goods can not enter the country you can not raise revenue on them. But if you will lower your rates of duty to a point where reasonable and fair competition is arrived at, more goods will come into the country, and consequently more revenue will be collected at the customhouses.

In presenting these schedules of the tariff bill to the House for its consideration, we believe that by reason of a fair reduction in the tariff rates in the present schedules we will, instead of reducing, actually increase the revenue at the customhouses. Under the Dingley bill—and the Payne bill is equally as prohibitive in all essential features—the importations of cotton goods as covered by Schedule I amounted to only about 2.8 per cent of the consumption of these goods in this country; the imports of woolen to only about 6.3 per cent of the consumption of woolen goods. On some of the other schedules the quantity of importations compared with the American consumption did not amount to 1 per cent. Of course, in all of these schedules there were some articles that were highly competitive. There were a large number of articles on which the duties were clearly prohibitive, and on which revenue could not be raised. Now, our clear duty is to reduce the tariff on articles on which the present rates are prohibitive, and to increase the quantity of imports to a reasonable extent, and thereby increase the amount of revenue from the customs.

Now, you may say, and the stand-pat, prohibitive tariff advocates always do say, that the American market belongs to the American producer and the American manufacturer, and if you are letting in goods from abroad you are shutting down factories at home. I believe that the American manufacturer and the American producer are entitled to a large percentage of the American market, but they are not entitled to a monopoly. They are entitled to a fair opportunity to dispose of their goods at home, but they are not entitled to have the tariff wall built so high that it prohibits competition and gives them a chance, by combinations at home, to exploit the American people for the benefit of themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Either an individual or any great industry having 90 per cent of a business of the American people, or 90 per cent of the American market, in his control has a monopoly. There is not a man in this country who, if he controlled absolutely 90 per cent of the market, would not say that he had a monopoly. And yet among the great industries of this country, such as iron, and steel, and wool, and cotton, and glass, and lumber, there is not a single industry that is not to-day controlling more than 90 per cent of the American market; most of them more than 95 per cent of the American market. So I say a reasonable reduction of the tariff to a competitive basis, where there is a chance for fair competition to regulate prices, will not only be beneficial to the American people, but will increase the revenue at the customhouses; so that, instead of having a deficit in the Treasury of the United States, as we have to-day, we can increase the revenues to such an extent that the Government will have all the money required for governmental expenditures.

Now, as to this particular bill, very little revenue is obtained from most of the items. As I said, we are not looking at the question from the standpoint of protection, the standpoint from which the gentlemen on the other side of the House will look at it. But even from their viewpoint, most of these items should go on the free list. You gentlemen are not opposed to a free list. You have a free list in the laws you have written on the statute books. The difference between a free list made by you and one made by us is that you have always been in favor of making such a list either on articles that were noncompetitive in the American market and did not interfere with any manufacturing enterprise in the United States, or by putting articles on the free list to favor the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Two years ago the articles that you put on the free list were not in the interest of the American people, but were in the interest of American monopoly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The first articles we place on the free list are agricultural implements. Now, I desire to call your attention to this fact, that the census of 1905 shows that the domestic production of agricultural implements amounted to $111,345,000, that the importations coming into this country were less than $14,000, and that the duties paid at the customhouses from this magnificent tax levied on agricultural implements amounted to $2,775.

You levied a tax at the customhouse on the agricultural implements used by the farmers of this country, which only raised the pitiful sum of $2,775, and we propose to deprive the Treasury of the United States of $2,775, and in lieu thereof to give to the American farmer absolute freedom in the purchase of the agricultural implements he needs for working his farm. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to call your attention also to the fact that in that same year, when the production of agricultural implements amounted to $111,345,000, we exported $20,722,000 worth to the markets of the world, and during the last fiscal year our exports of these implements amounted to over $28,000,000.

Twenty-eight million dollars of agricultural implements sent into all the markets of the world, in free competition with the manufacturers of other countries! After paying the freight and sometimes adverse tariff rates to get into those countries, our manufacturers of these farming implements were able to compete with manufacturers there and sell a very large percentage of their total product; not their surplus consigned to a dumping ground, but a very large percentage, more than 20 per cent, of their total product, in free competition with the markets of the world. And yet when you wrote the Payne tariff bill and brought it before this House, with all your solicitude for the American farmer, you levied a tax, ranging from 20 to 30 per cent, and in some cases 40 per cent, on what he had to buy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as to leather products. The census of 1905 showed that the total production of leather products in this country amounted to $525,000,000 for the calendar year 1904. It has increased materially since that time. The imports for consumption in 1905 amounted to $437,000, and the duties paid at the customhouses were only $146,000, on a great industry that produces in this country over half a billion dollars' worth of products; $146,000, not enough revenue to support some of the commissions that you have created, on that side of the House, in recent years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the other hand, our exports of boots, shoes, and leather products amounted to $11,500,000 for the year 1905, and the amount has increased since that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is using the figures for 1890.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is correct, and I thank him. My eye caught the wrong line of figures in the table. The correct amount is $33,000,000; $33,000,000 worth of the products of the leather industry of this country in 1905 went to the markets of the world, paying freight and adverse tariff rates and competing in those markets.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that I do not care to be interrupted at present. When you came to write the Payne tariff bill you levied a practically prohibitive duty on these articles; not a revenue duty. Can any man in this House say, when the duty levied on leather products could produce only $146,000 revenue in a great industry that produces half a billion dollars worth of goods, that it was not prohibitive? You built a wall for the benefit of the manufacturer and against the interests of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, let me call your attention to your legislation on that subject. Take boots and shoes. The year before the Payne tariff bill was enacted into law the production of boots and shoes in this country amounted to something like $320,000,000.

The total importations of boots and shoes into the United States amounted to $129,240 in 1908. The rate of duty was 25 per cent. The great boot and shoe interests came before the Ways and Means Committee and clamored for free hides. They said that they must have free hides in order that their industry might prosper, an industry that was exporting large quantities to every European market. More than that, the leading men in the boot and shoe industry came before the Ways and Means Committee and stated that if we would put hides on the free list, we could wipe out every particle of tariff on their product; that they would go out into the markets of the world in free competition with all the world, and that nothing but the broad dome of heaven would control the expansion of their trade. Yet when they found that they could get free hides they came back before the Ways and Means Committee and took back their statement, and instead of taking off the duty and putting boots and shoes on the free list, when you had presented them with a free gift from the Treasury of the United States of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, you put a tax of 10 per cent ad valorem on boots and shoes, and that is practically as prohibitive to-day as the tax of 25 per cent was under the Dingley Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The importations before amounted to only about $129,000, and the total importations last year, 1910, only amounted to $175,000.

Only a difference of $46,000 in the importations of boots and shoes coming into this country after you reduce the tax from 25 per cent ad valorem to 10 per cent ad valorem. Can any man deny that it is as prohibitive a tax to-day as it was before?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I deny it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. More than that, I want to call your attention to the fact that a considerable proportion of the boots and shoes that come into this country are not competitive articles with American boots and shoes. They are fancy styles and fancy makes that are not manufactured in this country, and there is practically no competition from abroad with the boots and shoes that you and I and the people of this country wear.

Now, that being the case, where was your justification in giving this great industry out of the Public Treasury between two and three million dollars as a free gift and yet retaining a prohibitive tax on boots and shoes, when the leaders of that industry came before the Committee on Ways and Means and told you in the beginning that you need not do it? Can there be any other reason for doing it than that you wanted to protect a monopoly at the expense of the American people? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to sewing machines, the total production, as shown by the census of 1905, amounted to over $13,000,000 in this country, and the importations amounted to nothing. The exports for 1905 amounted to over $6,000,000 and to more than seven and one-half million dollars in 1910. Why do you retain this prohibitive tax on sewing machines? A machine sells in this country to the poor workingman who earns his daily bread by daily toil at $20 to $30.

I am informed by men who have been in the oriental trade that the same machine is laid down in the Orient at $8.25, wholesale price, including freight. If that tax is not in the interest of protected monopoly, why did you keep it in the Payne bill? You get no revenue from it; not a dollar. You levy a tax without a dollar of revenue, and keep it there in order that you may have a tariff wall behind which a monopolistic combination may thrive and flourish. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We propose to put sewing machines on the free list. You may say this will not destroy the monopoly. It may be that you are right, but at any rate the law we make will not justify the monopoly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. I find in your tables that sewing machines are not reported separately for the years 1890, 1900, 1905, and 1909, but are for 1910. Have they not been segregated before?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose at the customhouse the customs figures have always kept an estimate of the sewing machines. The figures I give are taken from the Census Bureau. I think the classification of articles in the present census has been broadened over former censuses; that is, it is given more in detail than in the census of 1905 or 1890.

Now, as to cotton ties—hoop and binding ties for cotton. The production in 1905 was $12,760,000. The total imports only amounted to $7,136. The total revenue was $2,576. On the other hand, we exported $127,000 worth of cotton ties. Considering the fact that this is the chief cotton-producing country, it shows that cotton ties made in America are able to compete in the free and open markets of the world.

It further shows that the Government is deriving practically no revenue from the tax. But I go further than that. When the Wilson bill was enacted into law the Democratic Party put binding twine on the free list for the northern farmer and cotton ties on the free list for the southern farmer. Each of them sends a great crop into the market; each competes in the world markets for supremacy; and the Democratic Party thought it was just, right, and fair that when these great agricultural products had to go into the markets of the world in open competition that baling and binding twine and cotton ties should be furnished to them on the same free basis of their competitors.

We gave it to the northern farmer, we gave it to the southern farmer; but when you came to write the Dingley bill, you left the binding twine on the free list for the northern farmer, but, in the interest of the northern steel mills, you put back the tax on cotton ties with which the southern farmer has to bale his cotton crop; you put back a prohibitive tariff that raises no revenue—purely in the interest of a manufacturing enterprise that had no competition. Can your side of the House ever justify that proposition? Can you go back to your friends on the northern farms and say, "Yes; we will give you and keep on the statute books free binding twine for your benefit because you go to the markets of the world, while we will tax the southern farmer on his cotton crop in the interest of our northern monopoly"? If you are not going to do that, then why did you put it in the Dingley bill, and why did you keep it in the Payne bill, and why are you not willing to vote it off in this bill?

Practically all of the articles on this free-list bill have a prohibitive tax upon them. With the exception of one article—cotton bagging and burlaps—they produce but a few millions of revenue. I am free to admit that the duty on burlaps is not prohibitive, that it is a revenue article to-day, but I say we are justified in dispensing with the revenue on cotton bagging and burlaps and giving it to the American people, because of the conditions that exist in this country. The great cotton crop of the United States brings back to the people of this country more money than any other crop or article that we send abroad. It does more to maintain your balance of trade with the nations of the earth than any other commodity. It does more to advance your trade and commerce with other nations than any other commodity; and the cotton bagging that is made in the United States to-day is of such inferior quality, made of such poor material, that a serious loss is sustained by the producers of cotton in shipping abroad. There is not a great agricultural product in the world that is so poorly prepared for market as our cotton crop, due largely to your attempt to put a tax on these people and thereby prevent them from purchasing suitable baling cloth at a fair and reasonable price. This country loses every year in our export of cotton thousands and thousands of dollars by reason of the fact that the crop is so badly baled and poorly wrapped in American bagging and is so injured in transportation that its grade and value are reduced in the ultimate market.

Under these circumstances, notwithstanding this particular item of the bill does produce revenue, yet since our cotton-bagging industry has not been able to produce a fair and suitable covering for cotton which must go to the markets of the world, we feel justified in giving up this revenue.

Mr. Chairman, this practically covers the proposed free list we have offered, except food and food products.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield for a question at that point for information?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield for a question, but I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to inquire from the gentleman as to wire. There are two provisions in this bill as to wire, one in lines 15 and 16, on page 2, and the other in lines 2 and 3, on page 3, and I want to ask the gentleman what kind of wire he refers to, and where that schedule is to be found under the existing tariff bill covering that particular kind of wire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not refer the gentleman to the paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not see how the gentleman can possibly base any——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yielded to the gentleman for a question. I do not care to enter into an argument with my friend. I will try to answer the question, but I prefer not to be interrupted. The wire that is put on the free list in section 2 is intended to cover the class of wire that is used by farmers who bale hay and straw and commodities of that kind. We did not follow your example. You left binding twine free. You put back the tax on cotton ties, but when we come to put cotton ties on the free list we are also willing to put on the free list the baling wire that your northern farmer uses to bale his hay and other products.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to include all wire that can by any possibility be used for binding agricultural products, or, on the other hand, for fences?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is very clear what we mean.

Mr. BARTLETT. On the next page there is a reference to fence wire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. I will answer the question. The intention of the committee in preparing this bill was to limit the wire that comes in to that used for baling purposes in one paragraph and in the other paragraph to limit it to barbed wire and wire used for fencing purposes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Wire suitable for fencing purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wire suitable for fencing purposes. Of course the gentleman knows we are very large exporters of barbed wire. There can be no doubt about the classification of barbed wire, as it is used for fencing purposes only.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is "other" wire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, wire used for fencing purposes, wire suitable for fencing purposes. Now, wire other than barbed wire, suitable for fencing, is mesh wire, net wire, woven wire, and nobody can doubt or mistake it, for such wire is not used for any other purpose, and the bill distinctly says, in a later clause, "suitable for fencing." I am free to say to the gentleman that it is not the intention of the committee to have the bill admit wire for other purposes than for fencing. I have no doubt when we reach the iron and steel schedule we will take up other wire, and in all probability there will be a reduction on other wire. There may be other things in the iron and steel schedule that will be placed on the free list, but this bill was not intended to cover a very comprehensive list and make everything duty free that ought to be, nor was it intended to cover all instances where duties ought to be reduced.

It is merely, as I said in the beginning, an endeavor to give to the American farmer certain things which are necessary for his prosperity in the raising of the great crops of the country, and on the other hand to remove the tariff tax from all food products which the masses of the people must buy for their everyday needs. When we take up the tariff bill, schedule by schedule, we will try to adjust rates according to our theory and belief as to what the tariff should be.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield further, I do not ask these questions in a spirit of controversy at all, but it seems to me that the Treasury officials will have serious difficulty in construing the provisions of a law that is so broad, because at present wire comes in under our Treasury specifications, and I would like to know how the gentleman bases his estimate of loss of revenue on wire when there is no such provision as this in the existing tariff.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is difficult to make such estimates, but as I said in the beginning, we have overestimated the loss of revenue, because in estimating we have included barbed wire, wire rods, wire strands, or wire rope, and the duty on all of those articles in 1905 only amounted to $294,000. Of course, if the figures related to fence wire only, the duty would be very much less than the amount shown in this report. The entire clause indicates only a revenue loss for the year of less than $300,000, which is not very serious.

But I am surprised that the gentleman should call attention to the manner in which the Treasury Department is going to construe this bill when the Treasury decisions are full, page by page, of constructions of the Dingley bill, and it has really been necessary for that side of the House to establish a special court at a large expense to the American people to enable them to determine what the Payne tariff means as written by my friend from Ohio. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, the other important article of this bill is lumber. I am not going into a full discussion of the lumber tariff or the provisions of this bill in relation thereto. To some extent this bill increases the amount of free importations into this country above those contained in the reciprocity bill and in the negotiations which the President has perfected with the Dominion of Canada. The Democratic platform has declared in favor of free lumber. The importation of lumber under the Dingley bill and under the Payne bill amounts to a little over 1 per cent of our consumption.

To a large extent the lumber tariff has been prohibitive all the time. We have put lumber on the free list because we believe we are justified in dispensing with the amount of revenue involved, and we give an opportunity to the American citizen to have cheaper lumber with which to build his home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to food products, I am not willing to say that placing food products on the free list will in all cases materially affect the price. It will, as I said in the beginning, prevent monopoly. If this bill passes, it will allow free competition between the meats of Argentina and those sold by the Beef Trust. There is no question but that to-day the price of meat affects the price of cattle, and the price of cattle is fixed by the great combinations which control the meat products of this country. These combinations fix the price of meat according to the demands of the market and the necessities of the case. This is the only way that we can secure any competition in meat products. It opens the market, especially along the eastern seaboard, to competition in meat products from Argentina. I believe this will reduce the cost of meat products and hence the cost of living. I am sure that the future will demonstrate that putting these articles on the free list will prevent the markets from being monopolized in flour and in meat for the benefit of certain special interests which control the markets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he has any comments to make, I am perfectly willing for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to him.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to know——

Mr. JAMES. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has the time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause on the Republican side.] May I ask how much time the gentleman from Alabama used?

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the other day in the opening of the debate on the tariff question at this tariff session of Congress the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] felicitated himself and his party upon the wonderful work which had already been performed by that party at this session of Congress, and stated, amid wild and clamorous applause on that side of the House, that the bills already passed by the House at this session of Congress exceeded in importance all of the legislation which had been enacted during the last 16 years that the Republicans had had control of this House and the 14 years they had had control of the country. During that time probably the most important legislation which has been enacted in a century had been enacted by a Republican House, a Republican Senate, and signed by a Republican President. When we came into control 14 years ago we found a depressed and bleeding country, with industries closed, with people suffering. Our people had almost lost faith in their ability to prosper. We reminded them by our legislation that the same blood coursed through their veins which had coursed there for generations, that the same sun shone upon the same fertile fields, that the same mines were ready to be worked, that nature was as bountiful now as ever, and that with renewed courage and proper legislation prosperity might again come to the land. And fulfilling our promises, prosperity again did come to our land as it never had been exceeded before. We took up many matters of legislation after the passage of the tariff law 14 years ago and the settlement of the question as to the money standard of the country; we freed Cuba; we acquired Hawaii; we developed the agricultural resources of our country and the Agriculture Department as the greatest educator in the land; we established the principle of the irrigation of our arid lands through Government support; we adopted legislation providing for control of the railways of the country and placing the powers now found in the Interstate Commerce Commission; we passed a law for pure foods and drugs; we passed laws for safety appliances on the railroads; we provided for proper quarantine regulations; we established a Department of Commerce and Labor; we created a Bureau of Standards and a Bureau of Mines and Mining; we passed the white-slave law, now working so efficiently. In many other directions we enacted legislation which no one would repeal. And against all of these that side of the House applauded the statement that already at this session of Congress the Democrats had passed through this House, at least, more efficient legislation than we had in the 14 years preceding.

And what have they done at this session of Congress which leads the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and that side of the House to say that they have already been of greater benefit to the country than the 14 years of legislation under Republican control?

They passed a resolution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote, which was previously passed in four Republican Houses during the time the Republicans were in control, and the only change in it was one which would seek to strike down the power of the General Government to preserve itself in case of necessity.

They passed a bill providing for the publication of campaign expenses before elections instead of after, and that was a bill that was already passed at the last session by a Republican House.

They have now added the Canadian reciprocity bill, which they did not prepare.

I shall not take time to dwell upon the great achievement which the gentleman refers to in connection with the reduction of expenses in the House by cutting off what he calls useless employees. Those expenses have been reduced only in the caucus, not on the pay rolls. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I call their attention only, in passing, to the fact that while one of the officers to be dispensed with was the assistant journal clerk of the House, and the gentleman who formerly occupied that position has been discharged, the place has been filled by another man, drawing the salary but not performing the duties. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I wish, Mr. Chairman, now that my friends on the other side of the House have presented a measure which they themselves have prepared, to consider that. They did not prepare any one of the three which they have already passed. They now present a measure which they have prepared. Let us consider their statesmanship from the point of view of their work, not from the point of view of their following our work.

The bill now under consideration proposes to put a number of things on the free list, and the first of these are agricultural implements.

This paragraph in the bill is as follows:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

As to a large share of these implements named in the bill, they are already on the free list, coming from any country which does not discriminate against us in reference to the same items. The Payne law provides that, as to a large share of the items described in the bill, they shall come in free when coming from any country which admits the same products free going from our land to their land.

Paragraph 476 of the Payne tariff law provides that—

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines, and cotton gins, 15 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That any of the foregoing, when imported from any country, dependency, province, or colony which imposes no tax or duty on like articles imported from the United States, shall be imported free of duty.

Now, the proposition in this pending bill is not for reciprocity, but to give to the other countries which discriminate against us our markets without restriction.

It is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that the imports of agricultural implements are not large. Agricultural implements sell cheaper in the United States than in any other country in the world, and probably will continue to do so, whatever tariff regulations are made, except that with absolute free trade there will come times when other countries will dump their surplus upon us, to the demoralization of our industries. The International Harvester Co., which is usually referred to as the Agricultural Implement Trust, if I remember correctly, not only has a manufacturing plant in Canada, but one in France, in Germany, in Russia, and, I think, in Sweden. It is not unlikely that times may come from time to time when that great corporation will, in its disposition of its surplus products manufactured in these other countries, ship that surplus to be sold here, not at lower prices, but at the same price, and yet the result would be that they would be made by foreign labor and not by domestic labor at home.

We accept the proposition made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that on this side of the House we are in favor of producing at home as much of the articles consumed as we properly can and of purchasing abroad as few as we can. We prefer to consume the articles which in their manufacture have given labor to our own fellow citizens, rather than to give preference to the citizens of another country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I am led to make an inquiry of some gentleman on that side of the House who is well informed in reference to this bill, as to what it means. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] a few moments ago asked the gentleman from Alabama as to the meaning of some provisions in this bill. The gentleman from Alabama wisely, as it seemed to me, did not undertake to answer very definitely. The gentleman from Ohio, however, asked the gentleman from Alabama what he meant by a provision in the bill. It makes no difference what the gentleman from Alabama means by a provision in the bill. The question is, What does a law say? The gentleman from Alabama, or the gentleman from Ohio, or myself, will not be called upon in the courts to construe this law. Every day the customs court is now deciding questions of great importance with reference to the meaning of a law which endeavors to be very technical and very particular, but under the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law, there will be an army of lawyers and importers and agents endeavoring to ascertain what it means. What are agricultural implements? I await the answer of any of the distinguished gentlemen in this House who claim to be the farmers' friends. What are agricultural implements? [Applause on the Republican side.] The bill says:

All other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

What are agricultural implements? Do they include horticultural implements? Do they include market-garden implements? I suppose everyone believes that a mowing machine is an agricultural implement; but is a wheelbarrow?

I hold in my hand the advertisement of Peter Henderson & Co., New York City, one of the great wholesale and retail seed houses and market-garden supply houses of the world. Are market gardens a part of agriculture? Are market-garden implements agricultural implements? Why does not some gentleman on that side of the House who knows all about the tariff give me the information?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. LENROOT will tell you.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He is not in the confidence of the gentleman who made up this bill. Can the gentleman from Tennessee tell me? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have heard many gentlemen on that side of the House describe themselves as farmers' friends, "because," each one says, "I am a farmer myself;" and yet not one of them knows what an agricultural implement is. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] And, after all, their information would not guide the court, probably, because while they often qualify themselves in this House as experts in reference to agriculture, I reckon usually it does not go any further than the floor of this House. Now, I am an agriculturist myself. [Laughter.] To me axes are agricultural implements. I can not run my farm without an ax. Can you? Are axes agricultural implements? Are they to come in free?

Mr. STANLEY. Can the gentleman run his farm without a hat?

Mr. MANN. I go bareheaded—not quite so much bareheaded as the gentleman from Kentucky, however. [Laughter.] Are forks agricultural implements? Are they to come in free?

Mr. GARRETT. Pitchforks?

Mr. MANN. Pitchforks or potato forks, whichever the gentleman prefers.

Mr. GARRETT. Table forks?

Mr. MANN. Are garden lines agricultural implements? I am reading from a catalogue of garden tools, issued by the great house of Peter Henderson & Co. The same thing will be found in every seed-house catalogue as necessary articles for market gardening. If market gardening is not a part of agriculture, what is? Are hay knives agricultural implements?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman for information.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not surprised that the agriculturalist from Chicago is pining to know what an agricultural implement is.

Mr. MANN. I am.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not think it is a matter of satire. I think it is a demonstration of candid ignorance.

Mr. MANN. That is right. Why does not the gentleman give me the information?

Mr. STANLEY. An agricultural implement, generically speaking, is an implement used in the tilling of the soil, whether you are raising a potato or raising an ear of corn. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, then, includes all market gardening tools?

Mr. STANLEY. Why, certainly. I would not cut the gardeners out. You would.

Mr. MANN. All right. Are knives agricultural implements?

Mr. STANLEY. Not table knives.

Mr. MANN. That is not the question. Are budding knives agricultural implements? They are used in every nursery in the country.

Mr. STANLEY. If they are used in tilling the soil, they would be.

Mr. MANN. They are used in connection with the tilling of the soil. The gentleman from Iowa here, who is a nurseryman, knows that you can not run a nursery without them.

Mr. LOBECK. Is a budding knife kept for sale in an agricultural implement store? You never saw one there. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever saw a budding knife in an agricultural store?

Mr. MANN. Not only have I seen them sold there, but I have purchased them there. I expect the gentleman does not know what a budding knife is.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman knows what a budding knife is.

Mr. MANN. I have known one ever since I was so high, and I know how to use them, too.

Mr. LOBECK. They are kept in the hardware stores.

Mr. MANN. Of course garden rakes are agricultural implements; are saws? You can not run a nursery without a saw; you can not prune trees without a saw; and you can not run a horticultural orchard without a saw. Are they agricultural implements?

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I am somewhat surprised——

Mr. MANN. I knew that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Doubtless your side is surprised to find trouble with the bill.

Mr. STANLEY. We are more surprised than troubled or dismayed. It is not difficult to draw a distinction between those implements which are necessary for the cultivation of the soil and those implements, like carpenters' tools, that a farmer might use in cutting down a tree, or those necessary articles of clothing that he might have to put on before going out to cultivate the farm. I do not anticipate that the court would find itself in any such maze as does the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Even in Kentucky where they have orchards they have to have saws; they are essential to the proper maintenance of the nursery. You can not maintain an apple orchard without the use of a saw. I do not think you could do that in Kentucky, for I know that when Kentucky does things it does them well. All over the country they have great orchards, and in every orchard there must be different kinds of saws. Is not that agriculture; does not agriculture include horticulture?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does the gentleman think that a saw is a farming implement or a carpenter's implement—what is his opinion?

Mr. MANN. I say without hesitation that it will require the construction of the court, and the construction is doubtful when you say that agricultural implements of all kinds and descriptions shall be brought in. There was never a tariff bill passed before with such general language. It has always been the custom to provide, for instance, in regard to agricultural implements "not herein otherwise provided for," or "not specially provided for." There has been no difficulty in the tariff laws, as a rule, because of other things that are particularly specified, but when you leave out that provision and undertake by general provision to cover everything of the kind it repeals everything in the existing law.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman speaks about specifications in the former tariff bill. If I recollect, paragraph 476 of the Payne-Aldrich bill does not specify anything except farm implements.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not recollect it correctly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman a copy of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I have. What paragraph did the gentleman say?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Paragraph 476.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will tell the gentleman what that covers. That covers plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural tools, planters, mowers, horserakes, thrashing machines, and cotton gins, with a provision that they shall be admitted free from any country which admits the same products from here there.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not want to divert the gentleman's attention.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not be afraid of that.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to get some information.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I are in the same pursuit.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would inform the House how many countries give us reciprocal free trade on farm implements.

Mr. MANN. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman name any country except England?

Mr. MANN. I can not give the gentleman the information.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I have heard the statement made on the floor.

Mr. MANN. Practically all the European countries have a tariff on farm implements going there.

Now, let us take another thing. What does the expression "farm wagons and farm carts" mean? Does that mean a wagon that has to be used on the farm, or a kind of a wagon that can be purchased and used in town? Is the Treasury Department to follow up the wagon and see whether Mr. Smith puts it on his farm or uses it in town? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Can a man who runs a cart here in Washington buy it as a farm cart, if he takes it to his farm, without duty, and can he bring it into town and use it here, or must he pay duty on it then? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Can anyone tell me on the Democratic side of this House—this wise bunch of statesmen who have finally drawn a bill of their own after passing three which we have prepared?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman construe an automobile as an agricultural implement? Farmers use them during Republican administrations.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman means those who farm the farmers use them. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Now, the bill provides agricultural implements, in whole or in part, of every kind and description. Does that include shafting of all kinds?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman just now asked what the expression "agricultural implements" meant. Does the gentleman know of any decision of the customs authorities with reference to whether, in section 476 of the Payne bill, the language "agricultural drills, planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines" is confined to those used on the farm, or whether it would apply to such as are used by Peter Henderson in raising feed or garden truck?

Mr. MANN. I think if the gentleman reads the section again, he will not ask the question. The section that the gentleman refers to does not cover all agricultural implements.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say that it did. I asked the gentleman a plain question—whether or not the language "agricultural drills, planters, mowers, horserakes, and cultivators," and so forth, would be construed to apply to a drill, a planter, a mower, a horserake, or a cultivator used by such men engaged in such business as Peter Henderson, whom the gentleman cited?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. The kind of implements specifically described includes all of them, whoever they are used by. There is no doubt or uncertainty about that.

Now, probably gentlemen on the other side of the House have not discovered the fact that "other agricultural implements" are not brought in under paragraph 476 of the Payne law. Other agricultural implements are brought in under the provisions with reference to manufactured articles paying a duty according to the chief value, as to whether the chief value is metal or wood. There are only certain implements brought in under paragraph 476, and they are specifically mentioned, but this bill throws wide open the door without mentioning or defining in any way that anyone can tell whether the thing brought in is agricultural or not. Let us take shafting. You can not run a thrashing machine without shafting.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Why, they have to use shafting on grinding machines on the farm.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Would not the Treasury officials, in construing a Democratic law extending the free list, construe it liberally so as to cover just as many articles as the language would possibly include?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman himself think it would cover all kinds of shafting?

Mr. SIMS. I would want it to cover everything that I think that reasonable construction of language would give.

Mr. MANN. But that is the question, What will it cover? Does it include all kinds of shafting?

Mr. SIMS. Solve the doubt in favor of free trade. That is what I mean.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman will not be called upon to construe the language, nor would he solve it either.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman has read from somebody's advertising list here of a great many articles and propounded the inquiry as to whether or not under the pending bill they would be admitted free as agricultural implements. I want to call his attention to this part of the bill under consideration, with a view of seeing whether or not the language contained in the bill is not broad enough to admit the very things he has enumerated free of duty. It reads:

> And on all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks it would admit it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I believe it would.

Mr. MANN. How about saws?

Mr. COX of Indiana. If it is an agricultural implement. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have not any doubt.

Mr. MANN. All saws would be imported as agricultural implements, all shafting would be imported as parts of agricultural implements, all bolts would be imported as parts of agricultural implements, and knives would be imported as parts of agricultural implements. Agricultural implements would be broadened out to include much; then what would you have left?

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the term "agricultural implements" be construed into the broad free-trade one suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee and intimated by the gentleman from Indiana, would it not vastly reduce the revenues of the Government far beyond the amount estimated in the report of the committee in favor of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Of course that is self-evident. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to spend too much time on agricultural implements——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It is very interesting; go ahead.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Because I have much more interesting matter. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I have some tables and letters here, Mr. Chairman, which I think I will not take the time to read, and I would ask leave now to insert them in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks leave to insert the matter indicated in his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I call to the attention of the House the following:

Comparative statement of the retail prices of binders, mowers, reapers, and rakes in the United States and the principal European countries as shown by the reports of Bureau of Manufactures, United States Department of Commerce and Labor.

	Binders.	Reapers.	Mowers.	Rakes.
United States	$125.00	$75.00	$30.00	$22.00
Great Britain	135.16	81.22	55.80	26.70
France	173.70	105.18	63.69	29.91
Germany	203.00	113.60	67.50	27.00
Denmark	167.50	91.12	60.30	20.82
Sweden	160.80	80.04	60.30	24.12
Hungary	243.60	121.80	81.20	36.54
South Russia	169.95	96.82	66.95	27.29
North Russia	180.25	91.70	66.95	29.05
West Siberia	167.98	101.97	72.10	30.90

NOTE.—The foreign prices are taken from the official reports published in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports:

French prices, issue of Feb. 23, 1909 (No. 3413).

Prices for Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Hungary, Russia, and west Siberia, issue of Mar. 3, 1909 (No. 3420).

Prices in Great Britain, issue of Apr. 8, 1909 (No. 3450).

And here is a letter from the general manager of the International Harvester Co.:

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.,
Chicago, April 18, 1911.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering you favor of April 14, I beg to say:

First. This company would not be seriously affected by placing agricultural implements on the free list. Its only objection is to accomplishing that purpose by a general law instead of by a reciprocity agreement under which this country would obtain some compensating benefit from the abolition of the duty. We have long been in favor of reciprocal trade agreements with other nations, because only through them can American foreign trade be built up or maintained. High foreign tariffs and the lack of reciprocity treaties have made it necessary for this company to establish manufacturing plants in Canada, France, Germany, Russia, and Sweden.

Second. The placing of agricultural implements upon the free list would not, we think, materially reduce their price in this country or cause any large importation of them, because of the low prices at which such implements are now sold. But if the prices are thereby reduced and foreign importations are largely increased, the hundreds of American manufacturers of agricultural implements who have not plants in foreign countries would certainly have good reason to object.

Third. The goods manufactured by this company—and we believe it is true generally of American agricultural implements—are sold in foreign countries, Canada included, at prices very considerably higher than are paid for the same implements in the United States. This subject was fully investigated by the Bureau of Manufactures more than two years ago. The Daily Consular and Trade Reports of February, March, and April, 1909, show that the American farmer buys his harvesting machinery for lower prices than they can be bought for anywhere else in the world.

In our opinion a reciprocal trade agreement is a better plan for accomplishing the desired results than a general law under which we obtain no compensating benefits.

Very truly, yours, C. S. FUNK, General Manager.

Now, I ask for information as to what the provision of the bill in reference to burlaps and sacking covers? It says:

And burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other materials suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

What is an agricultural product? Is flour? Does this propose to admit free of duty cotton flour sacking? Can anybody tell? Does anybody know? Is it proposed to admit free of duty the class of cotton now so largely made in the South, the cheaper cloth, much of which is used for sacking? Is it, or is it not? Does anyone know? Is not it just as well in passing a great tariff measure to find out in advance a few things that it means? Does anyone know what a burlap is? I have heard of burlaps for covering cotton. I have hung them on my walls for decoration. They are a very popular style now to decorate the walls in place of wall paper, a little more expensive, perhaps, than the burlap for baling cotton, but the burlap that is composed wholly or in part of jute under this will be admitted free. If you look at the dictionary you will find that burlap means a material made from hemp or jute. This changes the ordinary definition, and properly enough—burlaps made from anything, naming a lot of articles. Oilcloth is a burlap—it may be a very good thing to admit it free—burlap with a little paint crushed into it, or something of that sort. Is it to be admitted free or not? Gentlemen will notice in the bill in reference to wire quite a discrimination in two parts of the bill. I assume that when gentlemen preparing language to place in the same law relating to the same subject make a discrimination that they mean a discrimination.

In lines 15 and 16 it provides for admitting free wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products. It must be assumed that such wire is for the purpose of baling. Wire under that provision can only be admitted which is for the purpose of baling, and that is fairly definite, though in all previous tariff laws it has been considered proper, I believe, to describe definitely the size of wires by gauge, the gauge of wires being standard and well known, so that anyone familiar would know what it meant. But when it comes to the top of page 3 it is proposed to admit all kinds of "wire suitable for fencing." Telegraph wire is suitable for fencing. Is it to come in free? I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to say that wire for fencing was only barbed wire or made-up wire. Why, not at all. There are many methods now of clasping together two lines of wire so as to make a fence on the farm, not made up anywhere else. I have put them together myself within the last year—good-sized wire, fastened together by yourself on the farm, and that wire is certainly suitable for fencing. It is about the size of telegraph wire. Is it to come in free? Is telephone wire to come in free, too? Does anybody know? What is the size of wire suitable for fencing? I dare say that many a farmer uses baled-hay wire for repairing fences—that would come in free—but does wire suitable for fencing include every size between that and the large size that is used sometimes for fencing and which is very heavy?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Why should it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think this includes copper wire, as well as steel wire?

Mr. MANN. I made up my own mind on the subject that the only thing it would exclude, practically, would be copper wire, because not even our fanciest farmers could use copper wire for fencing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it would be suitable for fencing.

Mr. MANN. It would, except for the price. But it would include practically all kinds of steel wire. Is that the intention? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said no, but the bill says yes. Which will you take? Which do you think the court will look at—what some man says on the floor of the House in a speech or what the law reads which is laid before him?

I shall not discuss at length the cotton-tie proposition. I have heard it said, though I do not vouch for the accuracy of the statement, that cotton ties are put in bundles of 30 ties, which weigh 45 pounds. Is that correct? That makes a pound and a half to a tie, and I am informed that they sell for about 2 cents a pound anywhere in the country; that it takes 6 ties to bale a bale of cotton, which ties would weigh 9 pounds and cost the farmer 18 cents; that in selling cotton in the market the purchaser pays for the tie in the baling up to 20 pounds or 22 pounds.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I can state to the gentleman that his information on that subject is absolute misinformation. May I make a statement?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the contracts for export cotton agreements are always made where a deduction of 6 per cent from the amount of the value of the bale of cotton, or the bales of cotton, is deducted for tare, and in the domestic contracts the contract is made for a deduction of from 4 to 5 per cent for tare. And some time during this debate I hope to present to the House facts that will absolutely refute the information which the gentleman said he has obtained.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be well to refute it, because I understand that on those exchanges which deal in cotton—and I do not vouch for the information—as a matter of fact, they do allow the tare to the extent of 20 pounds.

Mr. BARTLETT. Twenty-two to 26 pounds.

Mr. MANN. Twenty-two pounds.

Mr. BARTLETT. Twenty-two to 26 pounds.

Mr. MANN. And that, as a result, the farmer who pays 18 cents for the cotton ties that bale his cotton receives 14 cents a pound for them.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is absolutely misinformed on that subject.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman himself to admit that on the exchanges they did allow tare to the extent of 22 pounds.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say on the exchanges. I said in making the sale and fixing the price; when you sell cotton for export a deduction of 6 per cent is made, and in making sales in the domestic market a deduction of from 4 to 5 per cent is made.

Mr. MANN. Very well. On this subject I call attention to the following letter:

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION,
New York, April 18, 1911.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring further to your letter of the 14th instant with reference to the above bill, which proposes to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots, shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Permit me to call your attention to various steel products covered by the bill:

Cotton ties.—The present duty, under paragraph 125 of the Payne tariff law, is three-tenths cent per pound, while the corresponding paragraph in the Dingley law provided a rate of five-tenths cent per pound.

Cotton ties are put up in bundles, each bundle containing 30 ties weighing 45 pounds, or an average of 1½ pounds per tie. According to the rules adopted by all the cotton exchanges in the United States and the leading commercial association of cotton buyers 6 ties weighing 9 pounds are ordinarily used to each bale of cotton. These ties are retailed, delivered at the railroad stations throughout the cotton belt, at about 2 cents per pound, making the cost to the farmer 18 cents per bale of cotton. One bale of cotton weighing 500 pounds gross, valued at 14 cents per pound, is worth $70. The farmer at present pays 18 cents for the cotton ties and sells them, included in the weight of his bale of cotton, for $1.26. Based on the present market price of a bale of cotton, the cost of the cotton ties is equivalent to about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total value of the bale. The duty on 9 pounds of cotton ties required for a bale of cotton at three-tenths cent per pound is 2.7 cents, equivalent to about one-twenty-fifth of 1 per cent of the total value of the bale.

According to the rules and practice of the New York Cotton Exchange, cotton has always been sold at the gross weight, which includes the weight of the cotton ties and the bagging. This same rule and practice prevail in all the cotton exchanges throughout the United States. The standard practice, covering all contracts for the purchase or sale of cotton, provides a limit of 22 pounds per bale for the weight of the bagging and the cotton ties. All tare (that is, weight of bagging and cotton ties) in excess of 22 pounds is not paid for.

Wire rods.—Paragraph No. 134 of the Payne tariff bill provides a duty of three-tenths cent per pound, equivalent to $6.72 per gross ton.

The average manufacturing cost of this commodity in the United States is about $27 per gross ton, f. o. b. works at Pittsburg, Birmingham, or Chicago. The foreign manufacturers' selling price, f. o. b. New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Savannah, Mobile, Pensacola, New Orleans, or Galveston, is $27 per gross ton. The duty of $6.72 per gross ton provided in the present tariff is barely sufficient to cover the difference between the cost of manufacture in the United States and the principal manufacturing countries of Europe.

Barbed fence wire, wire strands, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and wire staples.—All of these materials are galvanized steel products manufactured from wire rods. The cost of converting the rods into these finished commodities is much higher in the United States than it is in any of the principal manufacturing countries of Europe, owing to the higher labor cost prevailing in this country.

The present duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound on barbed wire is believed to be hardly equivalent to the lower cost of production of European manufacturers, as compared with the manufacturing cost in the United States.

Wire rope.—This commodity is manufactured from either plain or galvanized wire. The process of manufacture requires large and expensive plants, equipped with special machinery and employing skilled labor at high wages.

The rates of duty provided in the present tariff range from 2 to 2.70 cents per pound. The placing of wire rope on the free list would have a most serious, if not disastrous, effect on the industry in this country.

The average daily wage earnings at wire mills in this country are as follows:

Average daily wage earnings at wire mills.

Foremen	$4.25
Wire drawers	3.35
Cleaners and coaters	$1.65–3.00
Annealers	1.80–2.25
Nail-machine operators	1.60–3.00
Inspectors	1.65–3.25
Galvanizers	2.55–3.25
Barb wire and fence machine operators	1.85–4.85
Stationary engineers	2.40–3.40
Machinists	2.10–3.60
Millwrights	2.60–3.65
Ordinary labor, 14 to 22 cents per hour	1.65–2.65
Approximate average for all labor employed around wire mills	2.65

The above scale of wages is about two and one-fifth times greater than that prevailing in the same industry in Great Britain, Germany, France, and Belgium; in other words, the wages paid in the iron and steel industry in European countries are about 55 per cent less than those paid for the same labor in this country.

Under these circumstances, it is quite evident that the placing of the foregoing articles on the free list will have a disastrous effect upon the manufacturing industries of this country, entailing great hardship and loss of employment to a vast number of American workmen.

The only way in which American manufacturers could hope to compete with European manufacturers in this market would be to reduce the American wage scale to the level of that paid European workmen. Owing to the high standards of living enjoyed by our working people, such a readjustment could not be accomplished without great suffering and a possible paralysis of business.

Yours, very truly,

E. H. GARY, Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the provision in reference to leather and boots and shoes. It is one of the curiosities of legislation, and I would not submit the statement that I propose to make without having first submitted it to a Treasury expert for opinion, to see whether I was an infernal fool or not. [Laughter.] The paragraph in this free-list bill reads as follows:

Grain, buff, split, rough, and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Hides of cattle are free, and under the bill it is proposed to make leather and boots and shoes made from cattle hides free. That is all right. That is euphonious. But we import a great quantity of leather which is not made from hides of cattle or calfskin, and this does not admit, as I understand it, patent, japanned, varnished, or enameled leather free made from kid or goat skins. The law puts quite a tariff on that character of leather. This would admit boots and shoes made for the farmer free, but not boots and shoes made for his wife free, because her shoes are not made from cattle hides. But what does it do? Having kept a tariff on enameled and japanned and patent leather, it admits them free if they are partly manufactured. The manufacturer in this country who is making boots and shoes is compelled to pay a tariff on his patent or enameled or varnished leather or any kid or goat skin leather, but if he will have it cut into uppers in the other country it comes in free of duty. How philosophical that is! [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The raw material can not be admitted free, but if it be manufactured partly abroad, then it can be brought in free——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Thereby helping American labor—nit! [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. What does it do? Leaving the tariff on fancy leather, kid leather, and goat leather of all kinds, it then admits free of duty leather of all sorts cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles. Keeping the tariff on all kinds of leather except cattle leather, it admits free of duty all other kinds of leather if partly manufactured, which would admit gloves free if partly manufactured. You keep a tariff on the kid and goat skins, but if they cut them up ready to be sewed into gloves, then they are to be admitted free. If they cut them up into shoe uppers or vamps, then they are to be admitted free. If they cut up leather to be made into belts, then it is to be admitted free.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was candid in saying that this was not a protective measure. But I had supposed that even on that side of the House it was not desired to legislate against equality of American manufactures. And yet here is a premium put directly in the bill upon the manufacture abroad instead of at home. If the manufacturer here wants to keep on making shoes and not pay the tariff on the leather and bring in the shoe uppers and vamps manufactured abroad, he can bring them in free. What wonderful statesmanship that is! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The total importations of leather and tanned skins and manufactures of the same in the last fiscal year were valued at sixteen million and odd dollars, on which the duties were five million and odd dollars, equivalent to 32.01 per cent.

In the report of the Committee on Ways and Means the value of the importations for last year under the leather and boot and shoe paragraph was given at $1,319,622. But, as a matter of fact, apparently nearly all of the $16,000,000 worth could and probably would be brought in free if partly manufactured or cut into forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles, and the estimate in the report of the committee as to the tariff collected is therefore wholly misleading.

Mr. Chairman, I have had not a great deal of personal sympathy with those gentlemen engaged in the boot and shoe business who were vigorously insisting upon having free hides and yet want a tariff on shoes, especially since many of them stated when they were urging the removal of the tariff on hides that they would be satisfied at the same time to have the tariff taken off shoes.

If they were the only ones involved, it would not matter much to me; but after all it is to the interest of our country to have as much as possible of the business in the way of manufacturing done at home, and I protest against a bill which gives not equality but preference to the manufacturer abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.] Having provided first in the bill that leather partly manufactured shall come in free, while the same leather if not manufactured at all pays a duty, it then proposes to put the product of the shoemaker upon the free list, but leave him still to pay a tariff on the things which he uses.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. In 1909 our exports of leather, shoes, and harness were $41,000,000. Since free hides have been given to these gentlemen they exported in 1910 $51,127,000 worth of boots and shoes, harness, and leather goods. Does the gentleman seriously contend that these gentlemen who are able to export $51,000,000 worth of goods, and sell them in competition with what the gentleman calls the poorly paid labor of foreign countries, need that protection when it comes to selling at home, when the freight rates are in their favor? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have often observed that anybody on the Democratic side of the House can get up and ask a question amid wild applause by some of the new Members on that side.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the applause is offensive to the gentleman, I ask the gentlemen who indulged in it to withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. The applause is not offensive to the gentleman at all. I admire both the spirit and the ignorance from which it proceeds. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am sure——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to both gentlemen at once.

Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman from Illinois think that a new Member has not even the right to applaud?

Mr. MANN. I think he has a right, and I love to see him exercise it, as the gentleman from Oklahoma often did when he first came here. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am sure the gentleman loves to hear that applause, because this is not the first time that he has alluded to applause that has come from this side of the House when somebody on this side has landed on him; and because he has so frequently alluded to the applause over here, I am sure that he must love it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not objecting, even to the gentleman from Missouri, who often submits remarks, but seldom information. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is not argument, and I will make no reply to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because of the confusion that existed, I was unable to catch the gentleman's reply to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Will the gentleman from Illinois repeat it?

Mr. MANN. At the proper time I propose to answer the gentleman from Kentucky. I should like to make this remark——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if, in alluding to the applause of new Members, he meant thereby to say that the new Members on this side of the House would not have made the applause if such new Members were properly informed as to the subject matter under discussion?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's question is so involved that I will undertake to read it in the RECORD later, and at some time in the future, if I have time, will reply to it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois again yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if the reference made by the gentleman from Illinois to the new Members and to the applause of the new Members was intended to say to them that they were too ignorant to know the subject matter under discussion?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I were compelled to answer that question I might answer it one way as applied to the gentleman now addressing me and another way as applied to the other members of the committee. For that reason I prefer not to answer it. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to proceed for a moment. The question submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] shows what seems to me a very creditable record on the part of the shoe manufacturers of the country, and while he assumes that because they have done a great business, therefore they ought to be swatted in the face, I think because they do a great business they are entitled to a fair consideration and a hearing before adverse legislation by Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JAMES. The point to which I referred——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to complete my answer to his question——

Mr. JAMES. I thought the gentleman was through; his side seemed to think so.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. No; that was only one volley. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. What is proposed by the bill? The American shoe manufacturer to-day is at least on even terms with his foreign competitor. You say that he has the advantage of a tariff of 5 or 10 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. It will be claimed by the gentleman from Kentucky that the American manufacturer now has an advantage in his favor by reason of the tariff. That is true. What does the gentleman propose to do? Under this tariff which we have had in our favor we have built up a great industry, which has exported goods abroad. These gentlemen by this bill propose to strike down that industry and take away not the advantage only which the American manufacturer has, but to give his foreign competitor the advantage. Take the leather of the tanner. You propose to admit leather made from cattle hides free of duty, but you propose to leave the tariff on tanning extract. Is that fair?

We imported last year 98,000,000 pounds of tanning extract and paid a tariff on it. We imported 90,000,000 pounds of quebracho extract, upon which there was collected a tariff of three-quarters of a cent a pound. Do you think it is placing the tanner on an equal footing with his foreign competitor to give him free hides and give them free hides, and make the American tanner pay for his tanning extract and give them their tanning extract free of duty?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman seriously contend that these boot and shoe manufacturers, who went before the Ways and Means Committee and said, "If you will give us free hides, you can take off the tariff on boots and shoes," are in any danger when they are now exporting $13,000,000 worth of boots and shoes to every part of the civilized world and selling them in competition with foreign competitors, where they have to pay the freight before they can get on the ground? Does not the gentleman think they are fairly safe when they have the freight rate on their side and free hides given to them?

Mr. MANN. In the first place, they do not have the freight rate on their side. If the gentleman from Kentucky was as familiar with the freight question as he is with many others, he would know that it is often possible to ship goods from here or from a much more distant point in the country to Europe for less money than it costs to ship them from here to New York City.

Mr. JAMES. My experience——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's experience with foreign freight rates is nil.

Mr. JAMES. My experience with the American manufacturer is that he is as cool, clear-headed, and long sighted as any manufacturer in foreign countries when it comes to obtaining freight rates.

Mr. MANN. I expect the gentleman's experience with the foreign manufacturer is not very great.

Mr. JAMES. That may be true.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that it is as great as mine, and I do not profess to have any great experience on the subject. Now, what does this bill propose to do here? To levy a penalty on the American manufacturer. How has the American manufacturer achieved his success in the foreign market in making his shoes? We developed the shoe machinery for the making of cheap shoes. We put our ingenuity to work to provide machinery which has driven out the shoemaker in the country everywhere, nearly, and shoes are now made cheaply by machinery. But does the gentleman from Kentucky or anybody else think that a monopoly of brains or ingenuity remains in America? Germans have their men over here now studying our manufacture of shoes and our machinery.

Our shoe manufacturers are within the control of a patent monopoly on shoe machines. The foreign manufacturer is not within the control of a patent monopoly on shoe machinery, because in Germany and in France and other countries there is competition in this shoe machinery, all in the main modeled after our shoe machinery, but over there not controlled by the patents which control it here. They are able to produce in many instances now, and their trade is growing, the same kind of shoes, made with the same machinery, with cheaper labor, than our manufacturers can do. But you propose to keep a tariff on rubber cement which goes into shoes of 20 per cent, of 25 per cent on cotton drill or duck which goes into shoes, of 45 per cent on eyelets, or more if they are celluloid, of 44 cents per pound and 50 per cent on felt of wool that goes into shoes, or 45 per cent if it is felt of cotton. There are other articles that go into the making of shoes that have a tariff upon them. You propose to leave the tariff on all of these things that go into shoes, the cost of which amounts to considerable, and take off the tariff from the finished product, and then say to the manufacturer, you are on even terms with the foreign manufacturer, although the foreign manufacturer does not have to pay this tariff.

I shall insert in the RECORD some letters I have received in regard to boots and shoes and leather in relation to the free list:

RESOLUTION PASSED BY THE SHOE AND LEATHER ASSOCIATION OF CHICAGO APRIL 17, 1911.

Whereas a bill is pending before Congress which seeks to place leather, shoes, and harness on the free list; and

Whereas our industries could not compete successfully with the products of foreign countries made under lower wage conditions without such measure of protection as may be necessary to offset the difference in the low cost of labor in foreign countries and the cost of labor of American mechanics; and

Whereas the production of shoes, leather, and harness are independent competitive industries to a greater extent than almost any other; and

Whereas the complication and ramifications are so many that tariff changes, if any, should be made only after a most thorough study of conditions and labor costs at home and abroad, and also the consideration of the duties now imposed on component parts and articles entering into the cost of leather, shoes, and harness which now are admitted free in competitive foreign countries; and

Whereas this measure was drawn without hearings or opportunity being given anyone to submit evidence as to its effect upon the many thousands of establishments and workpeople scattered over every State; and

Whereas the placing of leather, shoes, and harness on the free list also controverts alike the protective and revenue principles of tariff legislation; and

Whereas the placing of these articles upon the free list would be unwarranted, revolutionary, and a radical departure from all previous legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we protest against the Underwood bill in so far as it attempts to place leather, shoes, and harness on the free list, and demand that our industries be granted hearings before being subjected to drastic, injurious, and unjust legislation.

Similar resolutions were passed by the National Association of Tanners:

AMERICAN OAK LEATHER CO.,
Cincinnati, Ohio, April 18, 1911.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 14th, referred to us from our Chicago house, we believe it would be a serious mistake in the present condition of the leather industry to put leather on the free list.

European tanners now have several advantages in the production of leather, and to put it on the free list would enable them to produce and market their product in this country at prices to meet which would show a loss to our home industry.

We now have to import large quantities of hides, some from Europe, others from countries which can deliver in Europe to better advantage than to our country.

Most of our tanneries are far inland, necessitating heavy railroad-freight charges on hides imported. Also freight rates on leather from these inland tanneries to New England States are much greater than the freight from Europe to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore.

We have to import large quantities of tanning extract; quebracho alone amounted to 147,109,443 pounds in 1909, which is taxed three-fourths cent per pound. English tanners get this free of duty.

The price of cod oil is increased by the import duty of 15 cents per gallon. The same applies to linseed oil, of which we use large quantities, taxed at 15 cents per gallon. These only as part of the materials used carrying a tax.

All these items being free of duty in England, and with their cheaper labor and low ocean rate of freight, if not prevented by an import tax, the English tanner will be able to put his leather into the large eastern shoe manufacturing cities at a less price than at which it can possibly be produced in our home tanneries.

Heavy leathers now have only a protective duty of 5 per cent, and our markets are at any time subject to being invaded by European tanners to our serious embarrassment.

We earnestly protest against any further reduction of import duty on any grades of leather.

Yours, truly, THE AMERICAN OAK LEATHER CO.

APRIL 18, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have before me House bill 4413, which was introduced by you April 12.

Referring to lines 15 to 22, inclusive, which refer to boots, shoes, leathers, and kindred articles, will try and explain our position as it appeals to me, with a view of attempting to get you to alter your views as regards the boot and shoe trade.

As the bill reads, you have made all shoes free, except those made from goatskin and patent leather, shoes made from sides or goatskins, as well as any shoes made from fabrics, and all shoes made out of any leathers not of the bovine species.

Your bill reads so that only leathers of the bovine species are admitted free. Finished kid skins and all kinds of varnished or enameled leather, which, if leather is to be put on the free list, should also be included.

If shoes and leather are to be free, why these exceptions?

If boots and shoes and all finished leathers are to be on the free list, can you expect shoe manufacturers to meet competitive conditions unless all the materials which are used in making a pair of shoes are also on the free list? This applies with equal force to any and all the ingredients which may be used in tanning leather.

For your information I want to give you a few of the many items that are used in making a pair of shoes: Rubber cement, cotton drill and duck, various dressings, eyelets (brass, steel, enameled, and celluloid), buttons, felt, flannel, flour, rubber goring, glue, laces, nails of different sizes and kinds, needles, oilcloth, paste, pitch, rivets, shellac, silk thread, silk for top facing, stays of cloth, linen thread, cotton thread, twine, velvet, tacks, wax, wire (brass and steel).

Surely it is not expected that shoe manufacturers in America can compete with Europeans and have any of the materials which they use dutiable and have the finished product—boots and shoes—free. Furthermore, it is a well-known fact that we have in the United States about 1,300 shoe manufacturers and about 2,500 jobbers, all competing and striving for business. Naturally, with such intense internal competition it is but right to assume, and justly so, that shoes are sold at a very small margin of profit; in fact, so small that, although shoemaking is one of the largest industries, it is one of the most unremunerative.

Take, for instance, shoe machinery; it is to-day absolutely in the control of one company, and whatever price it may put on its shoe machinery or the conditions it may make must be complied with by the shoe manufacturer. Certainly, if shoes are admitted free, shoe machinery should also be free of duty, as Europeans not only have the same machines which we use, made by the same company, but, in addition, have independent companies competing, which give them a decided advantage.

During the last tariff readjustment, if you will remember, hides were made free, boots and shoes were reduced to a 10 per cent ad valorem basis, sole leather was cut to a 5 per cent ad valorem basis, and calfskins were reduced to 15 per cent ad valorem, and we do not believe that any further reduction on any of these commodities would be for the general good of the industry; in fact, we know from the facts we have at our command that a further reduction would very greatly cripple the industry mentioned.

Take, for instance, a welt shoe such as is manufactured in the West, which retails at $3.50 to $6 per pair; the actual labor cost on that shoe varies in different localities and according to the quality of the work from 40 to 70 cents per pair. We have a duty of 10 per cent at this time on these shoes, while the labor cost of Europe is from 40 to 60 per cent less. Unless we have some protection, I am afraid it will be a very sad day for the shoe manufacturer, and this is a condition that I do not believe you want to bring about.

We do not feel that the Democratic Party would be justified in singling out an industry which has developed as the boot and shoe manufacturing industry, free of any trust agreement or arrangement, and leaving many of the other large industries closely allied, strongly protected, intrenched as they now are.

I believe you ought to be fair and meet the issue squarely. Our industry to-day is not overprotected in any sense, and a 10 per cent duty is no more than we have a right to expect under the present condition in this country.

I hope you will reconsider this matter, and for the present at least see your way clear to eliminate boots and shoes from the free list.

If you persist in putting boots and shoes on the free list, leaving all other manufactured articles dutiable, the shoe manufacturer of necessity must reduce wages to the European basis in order to compete, and will be at a serious disadvantage, as skilled labor will seek the other fields and work in those industries that have a protected wage.

Hoping you will pardon the length of this letter, but being vitally interested I wanted to give you all the facts as best I could, and beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours, THE FLORSHEIM SHOE CO.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledging receipt of your letter of the 14th instant inclosing copy of bill 4413 for our consideration and answering your inquiry as to our objection to and the effect of the passage of such a bill, would state if this bill becomes a law it will result in incalculable harm to the shoe manufacturing industry of this country; it will vastly increase importations from abroad, especially on the cheaper and medium grades of boots and shoes, and in our opinion it will ultimately tend toward a reduction in the prices paid for labor by boot and shoe manufacturers in this country in competition with the cheaper labor of Europe, especially of Germany, France, and Austria, where wages in the shoe manufacturing industry are far below those paid in this country.

You may or not be aware of the fact that European countries, especially Germany, are importing our lasts, patterns, and shoe machinery where it is superior to their own and sending their young men over here to learn the American system of shoe manufacturing. It is only fair to assume that with their splendid industrial equipment they will soon invade this market.

We therefore respectfully protest against the passage of this bill, especially without a proper hearing of the shoe interests, whose very life would be jeopardized if this bill were to become a law. We are amazed that an attempt should be made to effect the passage of this bill without granting the shoe interests involved the courtesy of presenting evidence of the evil effects of this bill on so great an industry as the shoe industry of this country.

We thank you for calling our attention to the bill, and hope we may count upon your assistance in securing an immediate hearing for the shoe interests by the Ways and Means Committee before the bill leaves that committee.

Yours, respectfully,

SELZ, SCHWAB & CO.,

J. P. SMITH SHOE CO.,
Chicago, April 17, 1911.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: I have your letter of April 14 regarding the new free-list bill in reference to boots and shoes. My brother, Edward Smith, has also referred your letter to him to me to reply to.

I am inclosing you a circular letter to the members of the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association, under date of April 13, from the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association, and I believe this letter will give you more information than you could reach from any other source.

The manufacturing of shoes in this country that are sold to the consumers up to $4 per pair is done on very close margins, and with the exception of the manufacturers who do an exceedingly large volume of business the manufacturing of shoes has not been a very prosperous business, for the reason of the close margins.

Now, I am going to give you some facts regarding our own manufacturing business: We are one among the largest manufacturers in this country in our particular grades, and outside of a line of shoes that we make under a patent the net margins average about 3 per cent, and as the line of shoes above referred to, made under a patent that we control, is only 20 per cent of our volume, you readily see the necessity of us making a very large number of pairs per annum in order to make the business profitable.

The large volume of shoes that are consumed in this country are shoes that are sold to the consumers at $4 and under. Taking into consideration the difference in the wages paid to the shoemakers in this country and in foreign countries, I can not help but think if the duty was taken off of shoes that within a short time either the volume of shoes made in the United States would be largely decreased or the wages would have to be reduced to meet the low wage scale of the foreign countries.

The improved shoe machinery that is being used to-day does not require a manufacturer to employ the skilled labor that was employed 15 or 20 years ago, and there is no reason why this machinery could not be introduced by foreign manufacturers, enabling them to make shoes that would meet the demands of our country, and with the duty off would place them in a position to undersell manufacturers of this country, unless we reduced the wages of our help to meet the foreign wage scale, plus the cost of transportation.

In former years it required several years for a shoemaker to learn the trade. With the improved machinery that has been introduced since that time a shoe passes through the hands of about 100 different people in a factory before it is completed, so you can see that each workman does a very small part toward completing the shoe, and good shoe labor now can be made from green help within three or four months where formerly it took several years.

The average pay to the male help in our factory is about $22 per week, and with the exception of the young girls, who do a minor part of the work, the average pay to the female help in our factory is about $13 per week.

I am satisfied that there is no wearing apparel that is sold to the consumers that nets so close a margin both to the manufacturers and retailers as shoes. There are about 1,500 shoe manufacturers in this country, and those that have accumulated any great amount of money you could count on your fingers, and they have been almost a lifetime doing it.

The individuality that each manufacturer introduces into his product in the way of patterns and lasts makes it almost impossible to combine the shoe business into few hands, as has been done on many articles of more staple lines, and the result is that the competition in this country is exceedingly sharp.

Trust you will excuse this lengthy letter, but knowing you personally, as I do, I am giving you the facts along the lines of my 40 years' experience in shoe manufacturing.

Yours, truly,

J. P. SMITH,
President J. P. Smith Shoe Co.

WATSON-PLUMMER SHOE CO.,
Chicago, April 19, 1911.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of April 14: The removal of tariff on leather and shoes would work a great hardship on the American mechanic. By actual figures at hand the shoe mechanic in Germany, England, and Switzerland receives a maximum of 65 per cent of the price paid to the American shoemaker on a pair of shoes, and the elimination of the tariff as a protective measure for American shoemakers would increase the importation of shoes, which is now reaching a very considerable number, brought about by the reduction in the Payne bill. With free leather in England, Germany, and Switzerland (which is a very large producing country) and lower cost of labor, and with no duty to be paid by those competitors on the component parts of shoes and leather, it would give the foreign manufacturer an advantage over the American to the extent of 30 cents per pair on a pair of men's shoes.

Due consideration should be given in the readjustment of the tariff to the duties paid on tanning materials by the manufacturer of leather and on items entering into the construction of shoes other than leather, such as thread, findings, etc., which aggregate in tariff on a shoe that sells at practically $3.50, 15 cents per pair. The tariff on tanning materials entering into the cost of tanning leather in this country amounts to a sum equal to the former tariff on hides.

The amount paid to a shoemaker in England, Germany, and Switzerland on a pair of men's fine shoes averages 30 cents. The same workman in New England and the Middle West receives 56 cents.

American shoes have been exported in the past, due to their attractive features in style and finish. The foreign manufacturer has now adopted these American features, and a very large and growing percentage of advertised American shoes abroad are now made in Germany. Canada keeps our shoes out with a 30 per cent tariff and does not propose to remove it. They are making shoes that will sell readily in this country.

The introduction of American machinery, lasts, forms, and models in foreign factories has developed a very dangerous competitor, and the abrogation of the tariff would most assuredly result disastrously to the American mechanic. We have no machinery advantage over the foreigner at this time, and it is superfluous for me to call either your or your committee's attention to the fact that they have a great advantage over us in the cost of labor.

Yours, very truly,

WATSON-PLUMMER SHOE CO.,
F. A. WATSON, President.

EISENDRATH, SCHWAB & CO.,
Chicago, April 19, 1911.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY VERY DEAR SIR: Wish to acknowledge receipt of your very kind favor of the 15th, inclosing a copy of the new free-list bill, and relative to that portion relating to leather and leather products believe that if leather is admitted to this country free of duty it would work irreparable injury to the tanning industry.

In the production or manufacture of leather the three most important items are raw material, labor, and tanning materials. With hides on the free list it enables us to purchase our raw material in any part of the world, and in this respect we are on an equal basis with our foreign competitors. Regarding tanning materials, quite a few of them are imported, so that our foreign competitors here have a slight advantage.

Now, then, it resolves itself down to a question of labor. It is undeniably true that our foreign, or, more strictly speaking, European, tanners actually secure labor for considerably less than we do, and by removing duty on leather or leather products, in order to compete we would be compelled to reduce the price paid our workmen, which would cause considerable trouble, and probably could not be accomplished without possibly strikes or a long-protracted struggle, incurring great loss to the working class as well as the tanners, and pending the solution of this problem our foreign competitors would invade our territory and distribute their goods freely, thereby greatly endangering the future and permanency of our industry.

The tanning industry is not fostered or controlled by any trust or combination, and probably enjoys freer competition than almost any other line of business, gives steady employment to thousands of people during the entire year, it being a pretty well-known fact that there is practically no line of manufacturing that operates as steady as the tanners.

The tanning industry to-day is conducted along extremely close lines, and the profit, if any, for the last several years has been extremely small, and it is absolutely incumbent, if the industry survives, that the tanners must secure more for their finished product. We have no leeway, and if the duty on leather is removed, which will compel us to sell our product for still less money than we are now receiving, we will be compelled to make up this deficiency by securing our labor for considerably less money, which we naturally should feel very loath to do, and, as stated above, do not believe same could be accomplished without a great deal of hardship and suffering to both sides.

History has taught us that price is the best salesman, and with the different advantages that our foreign competitors possess in the way of cheaper materials and very much reduced cost of labor, it would be an easy matter for them to find a ready market for their product in this country, which would inure to the detriment of our industry, and the burden eventually would fall where we all dislike to have it, namely, on the American workingmen.

Very truly, yours,

EISENDRATH, SCHWAB & CO.,
Per A. C. SCHWAB, Vice President.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to the discussion of the provision of the bill in reference to meat products. The following is the language of the pending bill:

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

The Canadian reciprocity bill which passed the House the other day put live animals on the free list and left a tariff on meat. This bill proposes to leave the tariff on live animals and take the tariff off meat. There has always been a controverted question as to whether raw materials ought to be admitted free of duty as against the finished product, but it has remained for this bill to raise the question as to whether the finished product ought to be admitted free of duty, retaining the tariff on the raw material. Gentlemen on that side of the House probably assume that if the tariff on live animals coming from Canada is removed, that is a sufficient reason for taking the tariff off meat, without taking the tariff off live animals coming from elsewhere. We import but few live animals from Canada. We imported over 100,000 cattle last year from Mexico, I believe, and under the strange provisions of this bill if those cattle should be killed upon the other side of the line, in Mexico by Mexican labor, the meat would come in free of duty, but if they drive the cattle across the line and have American labor slaughter them, they must pay a duty of $2 a head on the cattle. That is philosophy for you. One might assume that the only competition we have in reference to meats is Canadian.

There is a great country to the south of us engaged in agriculture, the raising of grains and meats, which I think we do not fully comprehend. Under the terms of this bill preference is given not to the raw material, but to the manufactured products coming from Argentina or elsewhere. We do not import great quantities of meats coming from Argentina, but Argentina is a great exporter of meats and grains. Last year that Republic exported 89,000 head of cattle, 77,000 head of sheep, as live animals, not a great number, but she exported over 540,000,000 pounds of frozen beef, over 160,000,000 pounds of frozen mutton, over 20,000,000 pounds of jerked beef, over 24,000,000 pounds of chilled meats, over 26,000,000 pounds of preserved meat, and about 7,000,000 pounds of pulverized meats. We exported for the fiscal year 1910 75,000,000 pounds of fresh beef as against Argentina's 559,000,000 pounds, besides 20,000,000 pounds of jerked beef. We exported last year 1,989,472 pounds of mutton as against Argentina with 165,000,000 pounds of mutton. We exported during the same period 139,000 head of cattle and Argentina 89,000. We exported during 1900 fresh beef valued at a little over $7,000,000, Argentina over $12,000,000, and during the same time New Zealand exported $18,000,000 worth of frozen meats. We propose now to admit free of duty, in competition with our farmers, all of these meats which are exported from Argentina and New Zealand, but if they should be sent here in the form of live animals, to be killed and cured here, there is a duty on each head.

Do gentlemen on that side of the aisle think, when they talk about a farmers' free-list bill, that the farmers will look kindly upon a bill which offers a premium to Argentina meats in New York or other seaports where it probably costs less to bring the meat from Argentina, in the way of freight, than it does from the plains of Iowa, and still retain the tariff on raw material? We have a tariff, I think, of 4 or 5 cents a pound on hams. That is to be taken off, but the tariff on hogs remains, and while Argentina does not raise great quantities of hogs she imported last year over 100,000,000 bushels of corn, which can as well be turned into hogs in Argentina as it could be in the United States. What is the philosophy of taking the tariff off meats and leaving the tariff on animals from which they are made? What is the point to it? It has not been explained.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the gentleman has not considered the fact that our principal competitor, other than Canada, in the matter of live animals is Mexico, and that Mexico joins Texas. Perhaps there is something in that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Texas has a majority on the other side.

Mr. MANN. Yes; we imported last year 193,000 head of dutiable cattle, of which over 100,000 came through the port of El Paso.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The retention of the tariff upon cattle would increase the price to those who slaughter it, would it not—those who are engaged in slaughtering cattle and furnishing beef to the markets?

Mr. MANN. It would probably have that tendency.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then the admission of fresh meat—beef, pork, or mutton—would tend to bring those products in competition with those who are engaged in the slaughtering and sale of slaughtered cattle, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Do not ask me a question with "would it not," because I do not always catch the point. Elucidate it. I yield to the gentleman to elucidate his point.

Mr. BARTLETT. The point is this: You take off the amount a man pays on an ordinary steer dressing 800 pounds, $11 a head; it would take that off. That requires those who are engaged in the slaughter of cattle, the Beef Trust, to pay that additional duty when they import cattle. When you admit the products of fresh meat, beef, and mutton, and those things free, you admit them into competition with the Beef Trust. That is the point I make.

Mr. MANN. I understand the point of the gentleman now, I think. Let us see. The point is, if you keep the tariff on cattle coming into this country and the Beef Trust buys those cattle, that they are at a disadvantage as against other people who import the meat?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is it.

Mr. MANN. Ah, but the gentleman forgets that the great meat packers have already established packing establishments in Argentina and are already engaged in slaughtering animals there to supply the world, and they would just as leave ship them here as they would anywhere else. No little packer can bring in live animals, but the great packers that have their plants in Argentina can slaughter their animals there and bring in the fresh meat here and have an absolute control of the market.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman square that argument just made with the argument previously made, that to admit fresh meat here would hurt the farmers when you say the Beef Trust in Argentina controls the markets of the world?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it does not require squaring.

Mr. JAMES. Round it, then.

Mr. MANN. The Beef Trust to-day with a tariff on live animals is compelled to pay a reasonable price to the American farmer, but the gentleman proposes to let those men under this bill have control of the American market to the detriment of the American farmer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Under the existing law the packer who kills his meat in Argentina exports the meat to Europe, and the American farmer supplies the American market. Under this bill the packer who kills or packs his meats in Argentina will ship them to New York and the American farmer, in meats, will largely go out of business.

This proposes to admit meats of all kinds free. Does anyone know what "meats of all kinds" includes? Does it include chickens? Does it include poultry? Does "meats of all kinds" include poultry? Is it the intention of the bill to keep a duty of 3 cents a pound on each hen alive and admit it free when it is killed?

Mr. GARRETT. Can the gentleman tell us how section 286 of the Payne bill, which says "meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved," has been construed?

Mr. MANN. As to poultry?

Mr. GARRETT. As to meats of all kinds. How is the expression construed as it is found there? The expression which the gentleman has used is "meats of all kinds," and I wonder how it has been construed heretofore, because it may help us to construe this act after it is passed.

Mr. MANN. Paragraph 285 of the Payne law provides—fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, venison, and other game, except birds, 1½ cents a pound.

You propose now to include meats of all kinds. Does that include birds and poultry?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman just——

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman asks me a question, but I have the floor and I am asking him a question now.

Mr. GARRETT. I directed the attention of the gentleman to section 286.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I do not get on very well together about it, and if he will not answer my question about it he will have to wait. Does the gentleman think that this includes dressed chickens?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman used the expression "meats of all kinds," and asked what it meant. I merely inquired what it meant in the Payne bill; that is all.

Mr. MANN. It is so simple that I have been leading up to it, so that everybody would understand that the gentleman was forcing the question. What is the paragraph to which he has reference? He dwells upon "meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved," and then stops. It is always a wise thing to read a sentence through before you ask about it. It says:

Meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved, not specially provided for in this section.

Poultry is specially provided for, game is specially provided for, and other things are specially provided for. If the gentleman had read the paragraph through, he would not have asked the question.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman know that if this bill passes it will be construed in connection with existing law?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly; it will repeal existing law in so far as it is in conflict with it.

Mr. GARRETT. And be construed in connection with what is left unrepealed?

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman did not ask me that for the purpose of getting information on the subject, for the gentleman himself knows that all laws are construed in connection with each other. That could not be information to the gentleman from Tennessee, who is not only an able legislator but a wise lawyer, and is now endeavoring to bolster up a very bad cause. When this bill provides that meats of all kinds shall be admitted free, that repeals any provision in the Payne bill in reference to a tariff upon meats of any kind, does it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. In just a second. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question, inasmuch as I have answered his.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know whether I can answer the gentleman's question or not, but I will try.

Mr. MANN. Section 285 provides that fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and venison and other game, except birds, 1½ cents per pound; section 286 provides that meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved, not specially provided for in this section, 25 per cent ad valorem; section 289 provides, poultry, live, 3 cents per pound; dead, 5 cents per pound. Now, is dead poultry admitted free under this bill?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to permit me to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] if he will yield to a motion to recommit this bill to a Democratic caucus? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They could not make a worse one.

Mr. GARRETT. I am trying to meet the question of the gentleman with candor.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. GARRETT. This bill which is before the body now is an amendment to existing law.

Mr. MANN. Why, not at all. It is not an amendment to anything. It is a bill on its face.

Mr. GARRETT. It will be construed in connection with other laws.

Mr. MANN. All laws are construed in connection with all other laws on the statute books.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not remember about how poultry has been construed, but I remember that somewhere frogs' legs have been construed as poultry. [Laughter.] Whether or not poultry has been construed as frogs' legs I do not know. What is the gentleman's recollection as to that?

Mr. MANN. Poultry does not require any construction. Here is paragraph 289, under the Payne law, which says:

Poultry, live, 3 cents per pound; dead, 5 cents per pound.

It is under the meat items, and the other meat item expressly excepts it.

Mr. GARRETT. It does not seem as if it should need construction, and yet how has it been construed in the custom-house?

Mr. MANN. It has been construed to levy a duty of 3 cents a pound on live poultry and 5 cents a pound on dead poultry. But if your bill passes it will be construed to levy a tariff of 3 cents a pound on live chickens; but if they kill them in Canada they can bring them across the line free of duty. That is philosophy for you again!

Mr. GARRETT. Then they would bring them over alive, I suppose.

Mr. MANN. No; they would come in free if they are dead.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman stated they would come in free if alive.

Mr. MANN. No; I said they would come in free if dead. I hope the gentleman will read the bill before he again interrupts me.

There is another discrimination in this bill which I ought not to refer to, perhaps, but I am going to do it in a moment. This bill admits sausage and sausage meat free of duty, but it keeps the tariff on dogs. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. We have got enough of them in this country now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It admits sausage and sausage meat free of duty, but it keeps the duty on dogs. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is a good thing. That is good sausage. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know whether it is included in the sausage meat or not.

Mr. MADISON. Nobody else does. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. But it seems to me that is putting a tax on raw material and admitting the finished product free of duty. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the provision in the bill in reference to flour, and so forth, is that it admits free of duty—

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods, and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Under existing law can not the American meat packer import hogs and cattle and other live animals by paying the tariff on the animals, and if he exports the meat produced therefrom he draws back all but 1 per cent of the duty?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. SIMS. And that will not be repealed, so that the manufacturer can sell his products abroad?

Mr. MANN. Oh, not necessarily. A man from Argentina would be a very brilliant man in mind if he shipped cattle to New York to be cut up there and exported when he could ship the finished product abroad.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman stated that the bill retained the tariff on dogs. In his opinion, will that protect the dog industry in this country? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I am not in the dog industry, and if the gentleman does not know any more about it than I do, I will refer it to him. The question was not very bright. I do not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman has stated before that new Members here are ignorant. Now, he says the gentleman was not bright.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not say the gentleman was not bright. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he is very bright. I can see him shining everywhere he goes. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to take the tariff off the finished product of the grain, but leaves it on the grain. It proposes to take the tariff off flour, but to leave it on wheat. Argentina exported last year 69,000,000 bushels of wheat, which if brought into this country would pay a tariff of 25 cents a bushel, but if manufactured into flour or biscuit in Argentina under the bill would come in free of duty. How does that benefit the American farmer? What is the value of that provision?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe that would drive down the price of flour in this country?

Mr. MANN. Why, it is perfectly certain that there have been a good many times in recent years when the price of grain was higher in this country in proportion than it was abroad, and at those times, under this bill, flour would be made in Argentina from wheat raised there and the flour exported to the United States.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then the gentleman contends, if I get the force of his statement, that it would reduce the price of flour in this country. Now, let me ask the gentleman another question, please. What does the gentleman contend, if the Canadian trade agreement is enacted into law, as to whether or not that will reduce the price of wheat in this country?

Mr. MANN. I heard gentlemen discuss in this House for a week or 10 days the controverted question as to whether it would or not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I never heard the gentleman from Illinois discuss it.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman did not; and he never will.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman refuse to express an opinion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I am not going into that question. We have left that behind. I want to answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman wants to know if this will reduce the price of flour in the United States. It will cause Argentine wheat to be made into flour in Argentina and exported to the United States in the form of flour, instead of being brought here as wheat and being manufactured into flour in this country, and the labor will be in Argentina instead of the United States. Whether it is cheaper or not will depend upon the market.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If I remember correctly, the gentleman heartily supported the Canadian trade agreement.

Mr. JAMES. Cut out the "heartily."

Mr. COX of Indiana. No; I think he supported it heartily. If he has any fear——

Mr. MANN. I neither desire commendation nor care for adverse comment from that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Now, if the gentleman entertains any fear about this paragraph under consideration reducing the price of flour in this country and thereby reducing the price of the farmer's wheat in this country, how does the gentleman explain the fact that he heartily supported the Canadian trade agreement the other day, when it was so violently contended on his side of the House that if it was enacted into law it would reduce the price of wheat?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana is seeking to confuse me——

Mr. COX of Indiana. No; I am simply trying to get the gentleman to explain.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is seeking to confuse me, because I supported the Canadian reciprocity bill. I did it without any fear. The gentleman from Indiana did it, shaking in his boots. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not shake. I openly supported it. But will the gentleman explain his position——

Mr. MANN. I will not discuss the Canadian reciprocity bill at this time. If I had chosen to discuss it, I would have discussed it before.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman evidently then was afraid to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. No one who knows me believes that I am afraid of anything, much less the gentleman from Indiana. [Laughter.] I am not at all surprised that my friend from Indiana, who trembled when he cast his vote on the reciprocity bill, is seeking now to divert the attention of the House from this bill. The Canadian reciprocity bill was not ideal, even in my judgment, but it was as a rose compared with a worm, when you compare it to this bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield for a statement, my only purpose in interrupting the gentleman from Illinois is simply to get him to square himself before the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We understand the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana is very desirous of upholding my standing in the House.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I am not sure but that it needs it.

Mr. MANN. Some time I may call on the gentleman, but I am afraid not. I think, Mr. Chairman, I could easily differentiate between this bill and the Canadian reciprocity bill; but if I can not, the Canadian reciprocity bill was not extremely bad, and this bill certainly is. The reciprocity bill at least endeavored to admit the raw material free and levied a tariff on the finished product. You propose to put a tariff on the raw material and admit the finished product free. Where will you find the philosophy of that in any utterance of the great men of your party? I have heard that side of the House discuss the question that the raw material was entitled to the same protection as the finished product. I am going to wait through this debate and watch the gentlemen squirm and wriggle on that side of the House seeking to square themselves with their consciences, proposing to put a tariff on the raw material and admitting the finished product free, in the interest of the labor of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Argentina exported 2,555,000 bushels of oats last year. If that had been made into oatmeal, it would have come in free of duty, if manufactured in Argentina, but if brought in as oats, it would pay 10 cents a bushel duty. Do you believe in that? Argentina exported 104,000,000 bushels of corn. If ground in any way in Argentina and the labor performed there, it would come in free of duty, but if brought in as corn, it pays a duty, I believe, of 10 cents a bushel.

You propose to admit free of duty all prepared cereal foods. I will give a bright new dollar to the man who can tell me what prepared cereal foods are. There is a chance for you to add to your salary. [Laughter.] What is prepared cereal food? Does anyone know? We know that shredded-wheat biscuit is prepared cereal food, or at least we believe it. We believe that Grape Nuts is a prepared cereal food, and so is Egg-o-See; but is macaroni a prepared cereal food?

It is made very much in the same way and out of the same material as shredded-wheat biscuit, and yet we collected duties last year of over a million dollars on macaroni and vermicelli. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, Are they prepared cereal foods? What is this "prepared cereal food"? Is it a cereal prepared in some way, and if so, does not it include bread, specifically mentioned, and every other thing of that kind? What is bread but prepared cereal food?

You propose to admit all prepared cereal foods free of duty and leave the tariff on material from which they are manufactured.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. In the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, is distilled rye and distilled corn a prepared cereal food? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had asked me whether the products that go with the articles which he mentioned were cereal foods I should have referred him to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [laughter], who ought to be, and probably is, well posted on prepared cereal drinks, coming from the State he does.

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the gentleman that no Kentuckian who is familiar with Kentucky whisky ever called it a "cereal food." [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, with regard to that I can not agree with my friend from Kentucky, because I have seen many Kentuckians who called it both food and drink. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. But not a "cereal food."

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make the observation that those individuals labored under that delusion who went to Peoria, Ill., for supplies and did not think long about anything after it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I will admit that the Kentucky beverage has some advantages over doctored neutral spirits as they are made in Peoria. Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill proposes to admit biscuit, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

What does this cover? Does it cover those articles if they have raisins added to them or nuts added to them?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is sweetening.

Mr. MANN. Raisins are not sweetening. Does it cover articles if they have nuts added to them? There is a special tariff, I think, now upon these articles that have fancy additions. Does this provision propose to admit free of duty every kind of a wafer and biscuit which is not sweetened, no matter what else is added? That is what it says. Is that the intention? Can anyone tell? Does anybody know? Did the Democratic caucus pass a resolution covering the question?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman seriously ever see any kind of wafer or biscuit or other food of that kind with raisins and nuts in it that was not sweetened?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mother made them. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mother never made the gentleman any such stuff as that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is clear out of the world. He is not familiar with the trade. Under this provision of the bill there will be brought into the country, if it becomes a law, biscuits and wafers with nuts and other articles in them by the millions of pounds, if the balance or the cost of trade justify this, as it may; but does anyone know what it covers? Can anyone tell?

Mr. Chairman, just a word more, because I have talked longer than I had intended to. [Cries of "Go ahead!"] Well, it is partly out of regard to the gentlemen who hear me, who I hope will want to hear me again, and partly out of regard to myself and my conscience.

Mr. KENDALL. You are making us very dissatisfied with the bill, but go on.

Mr. MANN. One amusing thing in the bill is this—I suppose it is hypercritical on my part to notice it: The bill proposes to make fencing posts free of duty.

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is all right.

Mr. MANN. No; fence posts are now free of duty. I assume that when a provision is put in a bill it is put there to mean something. Fence posts of wood are now free of duty. What do they intend to cover by fencing posts? Is that the same kind of a post? If it is a fence post, what is the object of putting it in this bill, for it is already in the law? Fence posts of wood are now free of duty under the Payne law. Is this for the purpose of admitting iron fencing posts, or fencing swords, or something of that sort?

Mr. CANNON. Or cement.

Mr. MANN. Or cement or concrete? What is the distinction between fence posts and fencing posts on the Democratic side? So much for that.

The bill proposes to admit all kinds of lumber free of duty. I voted for the amendment known as the free-lumber amendment. I do not remember exactly what it covered when it was before the House on the passage of the Payne bill. I have no great fear of the effect of free lumber; but this is perfectly patent: The proposition to admit free from Canada all kinds of lumber, rough and dressed, leaving to the Canadian Provinces the right to retain their restrictions on the exportation of Crown-land timber will, in effect, transfer to Canada the manufacture of all lumber which comes from there into the dressed material. The Canadian Provinces, under the terms of this bill, have the power to write into every license which they grant the provision that the lumber cut on that public land shall be manufactured into dressed lumber in Canada. They now have the provision that it shall be manufactured in Canada. The Province of Ontario, the Province of Quebec, and the Dominion for the Northwest Provinces have the provision now that that lumber shall be manufactured in Canada.

If manufactured into rough lumber of any kind, it complies with the requirements of the license, but under this bill, if it becomes a law, we admit without restrictions all dressed lumber coming from Canada, and the Canadian Provinces, if they are wise, and they are not lacking in wisdom over the line, will provide that all the timber cut upon the Crown lands shall be fully manufactured in Canada. We could obtain the provision of free dressed lumber and do away with this requirement of the license if we put into this bill a provision in reference to lumber similar to the one included in the reciprocity bill relating to print paper and pulp. There it is provided that the Canadian people shall not enjoy the benefits of freedom of trade on Crown land products unless they remove all their restrictions on the exportation of the raw material. When our Democratic friends took the bill which was prepared on this side, they included some provision to guard the agreement; when they prepared a bill themselves, they forgot all that and absolutely turned over to the Canadian Provinces the control of the dressed lumber coming from there.

Mr. Chairman, but a word more. I have been schooled in that philosophy which believes it were better to give employment to labor at home than abroad; which believes it is better to do a favor for your neighbor than for a distant stranger; which believes that whenever we manufacture an article in this country and the labor is employed here that that labor in the circuit which moves around gives employment to some one else by consuming the article which labor produces. I believe it were wiser to continue the policy which has built up our country instead of now proposing to increase the revenues by lowering the rate of duty and increasing the importations. I believe it better to manufacture the articles here which we can make and consume here rather than to send our money abroad in distant lands in order to employ their labor which consumes their agricultural products. [Loud and continued applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I have only 30 minutes for the discussion of the pending bill I will ask that I be permitted to continue for that length of time without interruption. This House has recently passed a bill carrying into effect the reciprocal trade agreement entered into between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. Now, we are going to consider and pass a bill placing a large number of items of everyday use on the free list, in order that we may do justice to the consumer and remove the objections of the farmer to the reciprocity treaty.

There are none more worthy of our careful consideration than that great body of agriculturists, who not only produce the wealth of the country, but who at all times have been the Nation's surest protection in time of peril. We could not afford to pass any legislation that even in the slightest degree would work an injury to the farming interests. I represent a large agricultural district, whose farmers are intelligent, industrious, progressive, and successful, and we in our district have long since learned that the success of the farmer means the success of the merchant, the success of the manufacturer, the banker, the laborer, and the mechanic.

Mr. Chairman, the reciprocity agreement entered into between the United States and Canada did not entirely meet the wishes of the President, nor, in fact, the wishes of a single Member of the House. We must remember, however, that in the negotiation of reciprocity treaties there are always two countries to the agreement, and that it is impossible for either country to secure from the other all the concessions it desires. If it could have been done without defeating the treaty I would have been glad to have seen it amended in several particulars, but we had to accept it as it was or not at all.

This acceptance, however, does not prevent us from passing other legislation which will remove some of the objections, so far as the interest of our people are concerned, and to that end a Democratic caucus of the House has agreed to pass the bill now under consideration, which will remove many of the objections and, in my judgment, will do justice to and completely satisfy the farming interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I never believed at any time, nor do I believe now, that the passage of the reciprocity treaty will lower the price of a single farm product; neither do I believe it will reduce the cost of living to any noticeable extent. After five days' debate on the bill I doubt if there is a single Member of the House who will now stand on the floor and contend for a moment that a tariff on wheat, corn, oats, barley, and all other farm products we produce in greater quantities than we consume will in any way affect the price. It has been conclusively shown that prices of farm products are fixed by the price our surplus brings in the open markets of the world, and that a tariff on all such products is a delusion and a snare. If our farmers did not produce as much as we consume, then a tariff would add to the price, but statistics show that we export annually millions of dollars worth of all kinds of farm products, and it is further shown that our production is rapidly increasing.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that a tariff was placed on farm products for the purpose of misleading and deceiving the farmer; for the purpose of making him believe he is getting some benefit from protection, while at the same time he is being robbed annually by the protected industries of millions of dollars on the things he must buy. I stand here to-day representing a large number of farmers, and protest against the continuance of a system that gives to him no benefit whatever, but compels him to pay tribute to the vicious villainy of commercial vampires whose hearts are as hard as stone and whose milk of human kindness is more bitter than gall. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not at this time want to discuss reciprocity; but, as the bill under consideration is a companion bill, I want to make a few observations in relation to our trade with Canada. Statistics gathered by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, which can not be denied, show that during the past five years wheat in Canada has sold for a little higher price, on an average, than it has in the United States, and during the years mentioned we have exported into Canada 4,365,988 bushels of wheat, for which they paid us $4,442,307. It is also shown that practically all farm products are higher in Canada than the same products are in the United States. In the five years mentioned we sold to Canada 36,499,370 bushels of corn, valued at $21,704,373. In the same years we sold them 2,086,001 bushels of oats and 234,814 bushels of rye. We sold them, during the same period, corn meal and wheat flour amounting to $1,776,761. We sold them, during the past five years, horses for which they paid us $14,172,075; cattle, $1,578,179; meat and dairy products, $17,011,017; hay, $667,432. We are shipping large quantities of butter, eggs, and cheese and all kinds of farm products into Canada each year, where the price is higher than it is in the United States. During the past five years we have sold to Canada our products amounting to the enormous sum of $886,417,376, while we have bought of Canada only $393,913,673, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of nearly $500,000,000.

In view of these facts, is not Canada a good country for us to trade with, and what fear should the American farmer have from such competition? It is not contended that the Canadian farmer can produce any product in competition with the American farmer except wheat, and that contention fades away in the light of the facts. It is argued that Canadian land is cheaper than American land and that the yield of wheat per acre is greater. I will admit that Canadian land is cheaper and always will be, and that the yield of wheat the first three years is a little greater per acre than it is in the United States, but it must be remembered that after the third or fourth crop the yield is less per acre in Canada than it is in the States, due to the fact that three or four crops is all you can raise until the land is impoverished to such an extent that it is no longer productive.

On account of the extreme cold weather and the long winters the Canadian farmer can not rotate his crops as we do in the States. He can not grow clover and turn it under and by so doing build up his land and prepare it for another crop of wheat. On account of the climate he is unable to raise corn with which to fatten cattle and hogs, and therefore has no way of keeping up his land to a high degree of productiveness. The fact is, the Canadian farmer buys a piece of land and farms it for about five years and then sells it to some one who does not understand the conditions, and he goes out in new territory and buys land that has never been broken. Finally Canadian land will all be under cultivation, and then for the reasons I have stated none of it will produce as much wheat as land in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the present tariff on wheat is supposed to be 25 cents a bushel, but the fact is it is less than 1 cent a bushel. For 14 years under the Dingley law and now under the Payne law the American miller can buy all the Canadian wheat he wants and grind it into flour for export trade and then draw back from the Government 99 per cent of the duty paid. Under the present law he pays a duty of 25 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat imported from Canada, but when he grinds it into flour for export trade he draws back 99 per cent of the 25 cents on each bushel, leaving only one-quarter of 1 cent a bushel tariff on Canadian wheat. Therefore as the law now stands the American farmer has a protection of only one-fourth of 1 cent a bushel on wheat.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts, I contend, sir, that the American farmer has no fear of Canadian competition or the competition of any other country on the face of the earth, so far as the production of his products are concerned, but he does object, and he has the right to object to the fact that he has always sold his product on a free-trade market in open competition with the world, and at the same time had to buy his farm implements, wire fencing, lumber to build his house and barn, harness, boots and shoes, clothing, and, in fact, everything he had to have on a protected market, and has been forced to pay exorbitant and unreasonable prices.

I agree with the farmer that it will do no good, that it will not reduce the cost of living to put wheat on the free list and then continue a duty on flour for the benefit of the Milling Trust. The people do not eat wheat, they eat flour, and if you want to reduce the cost of living put flour on the free list, and that is what is done in the bill now under consideration. I agree with the farmer that it will do no good to put live stock on the free list and then continue a duty on meats for the benefit of the Meat Trust. The people do not eat live stock, they eat "dead stock," and if you want to reduce the cost of living put meats on the free list, and that is what is done in the bill now under consideration. I agree with the farmer that it is unfair to compel him to pay more for his agricultural implements and farm machinery than his competitors in foreign countries pay. You go over in the wheat fields of Japan to-day and there you will see the self-binder winding its way through the golden fields of grain, and on examination and inquiry you will find that it is an American-made self-binder, and that it is sold to the farmer in Japan for less money than an American farmer can buy it at the factory where it is made. It is an undisputed fact that you can go in any country in the world and buy agricultural implements, binders, reapers, mowers, plows, harrows, and so forth, for less money than they are sold here in the United States where they are made. And the same thing is true of practically everything the farmer has to buy.

Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the House have contended for years that a high protective tariff was the worst form of special privilege, but when we have done so you gentlemen on that side of the House have charged us with trying to array labor against capital, with destroying the motive power behind the wheels of industry, and removing the foundation stone of American progress. You have held a majority in this House for 16 years, and have allowed this system to continue, first, under the McKinley bill, then under the Dingley bill, and now under the Payne bill, until it has distorted the functions of a free Government into tools of greed and vehicles of oppression. [Applause.] What has been the result of your system? Why, as a result, the wealth of the country has been concentrated into the hands of a few people. It is enough to alarm us when we know that less than 4,000 men now own over 85 per cent of all the wealth of the United States, while each one of the balance of our 91,000,000 of people own on an average of less than $500 in property. It is not denied that 51 men now own one thirty-fifth of all our wealth, and these 51 men have had much to do with the legislation of the country during the past 15 years. As a result of your system we see the Woolen Trust extorting from the American people over $100,000,000 each year in excess of what would be a fair profit on woolen goods, and a large part of this comes out of the pockets of the farmers and a still larger part out of the pockets of the laboring people working in the mills and the factories of the country. As a result of your system we see the Cotton Trust charging the people over $90,000,000 each year more for their manufactured cotton goods than should be charged, and a large part of this robbery comes out of the pockets of the poor working girls and women behind the counters and in the sweat shops and factories of the United States. As a result of your system we see the Steel Trust wrongfully taking from the people over $150,000,000 each year more than they should take on steel products and paying to their stockholders large dividends on their watered stock. And these are the people who are now trying to make the farmer believe that he is going to be ruined if he refuses to stand for a continuance of protection—that kind of protection that has made millions for the Steel Trust, the Woolen Trust, and the Cotton Trust, but never added one dollar to the price of a single farm product.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the present system of protection is the worst form of special privilege, and enables its beneficiaries to build up colossal fortunes wrongfully taken from the people. It is nothing short of an outrage, and in the name of right, justice, and fair dealing I protest against it. So far as the tariff is concerned, I contend that the farmer has never as yet had a square deal; but this Democratic House is determined to forever put to an end the discrimination against him and give to all the people some relief from the burdens heaped upon them by the Payne-Aldrich bill by passing the bill now under consideration, which places many items of everyday use on the free list. I will insert a copy of the bill in the RECORD as a part of my remarks on the subject:

A bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

Mr. Chairman, this bill when enacted into law will not only do justice to the farmer, but will bring no small amount of relief to those living in the towns and cities of the country. By taking the tariff off of flour, meats, oatmeal, rolled oats, cereal foods, salt, boots, shoes, and sewing machines will most certainly reduce the cost of living in the towns and cities to some extent, while placing on the free list all kinds of farming implements, binders, mowers, reapers, harrows, hedders, harvesters, horserakes, planters, cultivators, threshing machines, farm wagons, plows, wire fencing, wire ropes, staples, belting leather, harness, saddles, saddlery, boots, shoes, sewing machines, salt, and all kinds of lumber, both rough and dressed, will without question save the farmers of the country millions of dollars annually.

One of the most important items of this bill is lumber. Every citizen, and especially the farmers, know the effect the tariff on lumber and the organization of the Lumber Trust has had on prices they are compelled to pay. All grades of lumber have advanced with leaps and bounds, until the man of limited means finds it impossible to build for himself a home. It has been charged and nowhere denied that the Lumber Trust, operating under a gentleman's agreement, is yielding a profit of over 200 per cent. A glance at the summer and winter homes of the "lumber kings" in the aristocratic resorts of the country will verify this statement.

Mr. Chairman, I am not only in favor of taking the tariff off of lumber, but I am also in favor of an antitrust law that will wipe out of existence the Lumber Trust, to the end that we may have a few less palaces on the hill and more humble homes in the valley. [Applause.] I was not surprised at my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the apostle of high protection, defending the Lumber Trust and opposing tariff revision. His defense, however, of a protective tariff was just about as satisfactory as the explanation of a colored gentleman who met a bear in the woods. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER] tells a story of a negro whose name was Rastus and who was out in the woods picking huckleberries, and when his bucket was filled he turned around to start for home, when he saw in front of him a big bear on his hind legs, growling and walking toward him. Rastus said that he thought the only way to save his life was to get out of there, so he sat his bucket down and ran as fast as he could, and after he had gotten away a short distance he looked back and saw the bear eating the huckleberries and concluded while he had lost his berries he at least had saved his life, but later, as he ran on, he looked back again and saw the bear coming after him. He ran faster and faster, but finally saw the bear was going to overtake him. He then discovered in front of him a large pond of ice, and he concluded he could run better on the ice than the bear could, so he started in that direction. "Yes," said one of his listeners, "but who ever heard tell of ice in huckleberry time?" Rastus answered by saying, "Great Heavens; he run me till after Christmas." [Laughter and applause.] So the argument of my friend from Michigan was just about as convincing, just about as plausible as the story told by Rastus.

Mr. Chairman, we are not only going to pass this bill putting lumber on the free list and the other items enumerated in the bill, but we are going to take up other schedules and revise them downward. We are going to take up the woolen schedule and revise it downward and save the people the $100,000,000 that is now being wrongfully taken from them on manufactured woolen goods.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAIR. I decline to yield at this time. We are going to take up the cotton schedule and revise it downward and save the people over $90,000,000 each year on cotton goods. We are going to take up other schedules and revise them downward in conformity with Democratic ideas and in accordance with Democratic promises made during the last campaign. My friends, the last election was fought out on the tariff issue, and the people spoke at the ballot box in no uncertain tones. They commissioned us to revise the tariff, and we are going to discharge that duty by keeping every promise and pledge made to them in the campaign of 1910.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill comes up under the five-minute rule we will see the same performance we saw in this House last Friday, when another bill was open for amendment. You will remember how the enemies of that bill tried to kill it by offering amendments, and the same thing will occur when this bill is read under the five-minute rule. The gentlemen on that side of the House will offer all kinds of amendments proposing to put other items on the free list for the benefit of the people, when their real purpose will be to defeat the bill. You will see them shedding tears in their anxiety to procure greater relief for the farmer, the laborer, and the down-trodden people in general. But, my friends, we must remember that their real purpose is to kill the bill and that it is the duty of every Member of the House who wants to see this bill become a law to vote down every amendment offered. How much faith would you have in the sincerity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] if he should offer an amendment proposing to put some additional item on the free list? How much faith would you have in the sincerity of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] if he should offer an amendment proposing to add something else to the free list? How much faith would you have in the sincerity of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if he should propose an amendment placing an additional item on the free list? Ah, my friends, when the time comes you will see these gentlemen offering amendments for the purpose of defeating the bill, but not for the purpose of giving the people relief. We know it will pass the House, and we have reason to believe, and do believe, that if left in its present form it will pass the Senate and be signed by the President. Therefore it is the duty of every friend of this bill to vote down all amendments offered.

Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the House have been commissioned by the people to revise the tariff, and we are going to revise it downward. We are going to revise it in our own way and in our own time, so far as the House is concerned, and if the people of this country do not get the relief they voted for at the ballot box last November it will not be the fault of the House, but the responsibility will rest on the Senate and the President. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor not to abuse the confidence of my friend, the gentleman from Alabama, nor the patience of the committee. I am not a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, nor do I feel that the weight of responsibility for maintaining the Democratic faith and the spread of the Democratic propaganda rests entirely on my shoulders. However, as an old-fashioned, straight Democrat, without any prefixes, suffixes, affixes, frills, flounces, furbelows, conditions, or qualifications [laughter], I desire to declare my allegiance to the plan mapped out by the great Democrats who are in charge of affairs in this House at this time and briefly state the reasons for my faith and course of action.

It would seem as though it was intended when I prepared my brief speech, as a little observation of the order of the speakers as we are introduced in alphabetical order will suggest—ADAIR, ADAMSON, AIKEN of South Carolina, and so forth, on the roll—that each Democrat in turn would address the House, not for the purpose of making votes in this House, but for the purpose of stating our position in correcting abuses under Republican domination, what the Democratic doctrine is, and the character of Democratic rule when it shall come into complete control of the Government. I, of course, did not hope that we would receive any votes on that side or convert anybody. It is impossible.

Ephraim is joined to his idols. Let him alone, that he may be given over to hardness of heart and reprobacy of mind, to believe a lie and be damned.

What we are concerned about is securing some votes at the other end of the Capitol and securing the approval of a President who has slighted and ignored one opportunity to heed the admonitions of the people. We want to see if he will heed the last thundering admonition which they gave him last November, or wait for the eternal and final downfall of himself and his party at the next election. [Applause on Democratic side.]

But I had not heard nor had the advantage of the last brilliant performance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when this program was mapped out. That versatile gentleman has given us an additional treat, new and improved stunts, sarcastic punctures, a great variety of criticisms, that would fill with dismay less stalwart hearts than those which animate the Democratic majority in this House. I confess I trembled in my boots and was a little rattled when I saw him, by punch after punch, make imaginary holes in the armor of Democracy, and innocently I went and asked Mr. Chairman UNDERWOOD if he would not better call a caucus and call this thing off. [Laughter.] But he showed wondrous coolness. He did not appear alarmed at all, nor agitated about it, and he advised that we just go ahead and make the speeches, and if the Democratic caucus called it off afterwards I would not be responsible, because I did not know what the gentleman from Illinois was going to say; that is, I did not know he was going to say all of it at this time in this way.

But I want to advise you Democrats who have been so severely pounded, whose doctrines have been so severely riddled and punctured, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is the most skillful special pleader who has been in this House within my knowledge, and no doubt would make the most successful defender of criminals that the criminal annals of our courts have ever known. Watch the success with which he parries all attacks upon the Republican Party. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we do not expect the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to approve our work or praise our bill. In fact, he relieved my alarm to a considerable extent when he said he did not desire either praise or censure from this side of the House. He wears the seven bull hides of Ajax. He is invulnerable to either criticism or praise when it comes from the right side of the House. All he wants is the servile following of the gentlemen on the other side, and I am firmly convinced that if the Democratic caucus should approve a bill that should come in here specifically approving that which their conduct has always approved, the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, the gentleman could pick flaws in them, and gentlemen on the other side would vote with him and against the bill. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

There is one fundamental error or willful misstatement constantly repeated and urged in the utterances of all Republicans of whatever brand, and that is that an honest Democratic revision downward of the tariff would cause a reduction of revenue, which they say we can not afford to make.

One distinguished Republican reformer, a self-proclaimed "progressive," lately made the elaborate argument that it was not proper to attempt a revision of the tariff until after the adoption of the income-tax amendment, in order that a hundred millions of revenue should first be provided by the income tax before it would be possible to spare the revenue lost by a downward revision of the tariff. I am constrained to believe that that man knows better; that he would really like to revise the tariff downward on the things he wants to buy and leave the prohibitive duties barring competition from all articles that he and his people wish to sell. That is the same disease that afflicts all protectionists. They do not wish to use the taxing power for the legitimate purposes intended by the Constitution—the raising of revenue. They wish to convert it into an instrument for personal profit, a weapon by which they can prevent competition while they hold up and exploit their fellow countrymen ad libitum, diverting legitimate revenue from the Treasury to flow in enlarged volume and everlasting current of graft into their own pockets. I earnestly favor the income tax myself, but I am not willing to postpone tariff legislation to wait for that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In that interview the distinguished Senator, for he was such, selected sugar to illustrate his argument. Of course sugar is a recognized revenue producer and doubtless always will be, but the schedule is so viciously arranged as to make the people pay the Sugar Trust many times more than they pay into the Treasury. If the differential on refined sugar, which benefits nobody but the Sugar Trust, were removed or reduced 75 per cent and the duty on raw sugar reduced 25 or 50 per cent, the reduced price would enable the people to use more sugar. Increased consumption would prevent diminution of the revenue, though the graft of the Sugar Trust would be largely curtailed, to the joy and benefit of the people.

That Senator's proposition is as bad as the President's subterfuge to secure delay or defeat of tariff revision by waiting for information from a protective-tariff board which was not charged or expected to learn or report a scintilla of information to aid in an honest revision of the tariff, but, on the contrary, was designed for the purpose of delay and to report heresies to frustrate such revision. The Democrats know how to revise the tariff. What they need is power to pass their bills through the Senate and run the gauntlet of Executive disapproval. If the prohibitive duties in the main schedules—woolen, cotton, chemical, and metal—were reduced only to the point of competition without going down even as low as the best revenue-raising rates, imports would rapidly increase, exchange of business between our people and the people of other countries would swell both imports and exports, and the Treasury would overflow with revenue.

Everyone who knows anything knows that prohibitive duties exclude imports, and, of course, exclude receipts from the Treasury, and from such protected articles no money comes into the Treasury, and that these prohibitive duties serve as barriers to prevent the incoming of competitive articles from foreign lands, thereby compelling our home people to pay whatever prices domestic manufacturers see proper to charge for their articles produced at home. Of course the price charged may approximate the aggregate of the cost of production and the duty.

An abundant revenue having been supplied by reducing prohibitive rates to the competitive point, the Government could afford to dispense with the duty on a few articles of general use and prime necessity or place the duty so low as not to "grind the face of the poor." A large free list, however, is not a cardinal Democratic doctrine. It is a favorite of protectionists, and is not only a valuable handmaiden of protection, but is the inseparable concomitant of protection. In other words, protection robbery does not reach its highest altitudes of monstrosity and obliquity until it can widen the range of its profits by selling its products at the highest possible prices and securing its raw materials as cheaply as possible or absolutely free. The doctrine actuates all protectionists, in whatever section of the country, of whatever brand or type. The Democratic doctrines and policy as to taxation are not to be gauged or judged by this bill alone. I shall heartily support the pending bill as only a piece or part of the Democratic scheme, other parts of which are to follow in due order.

The existing Payne-Aldrich-Reed Smoot tariff bill and the Canadian reciprocity pact which has already passed the House and is now happy on its smooth and peaceful way through the other branch of Congress, make ample provision for all manufacturers, not only to extend their markets for the sale of their products into Canada, but also to secure either free or at reduced rates from Canada all raw materials which they need in their business. Now, as a companion piece and balance wheel to that legislation it is proposed to place upon the free list a few things the transfer of which to the free list is supported by two arguments. One is they are articles of general use and prime necessity, the comparatively inconsiderable revenue from which the Treasury will be able to dispense with by raising a corresponding amount of revenue in some other way. The second is they are the raw materials which the farmer needs to produce and prepare his crops for market. Oh, it is claimed, farm implements and bagging and ties, and so forth, are not raw materials. They are the material essentials and indispensable elements which the farmer must have and use in the manufacture of crops and their preparation for sale. They are just as raw to him as thousands of other things are which are the finished products of other producers, but are claimed by manufacturers to be raw materials to them. Everything that the manufacturers use, no matter from what source derived nor how much labor and expense are involved in production, they consider as raw material to use in their manufacturing business, except cotton-mill machinery, on which eastern mills keep a prohibitive duty to discourage and hinder the building of competing mills in the South. Likewise everything that the farmer uses—guano, plows, wagons, horses, mules, bagging, ties, clothing, shoes, the wages he pays for labor—all are raw material to him. He uses them all, and as the finished product of them he offers his crops for sale on the market, and if there is any rational line of distinction between the finished products and raw materials, the farmer is as much entitled to have that line located in the right place as the manufacturer has. But the truth is there is not in law, politics, reason, rectitude, nor religion any such line.

If there is to be any doctrine based upon an imaginary line between finished product and raw material it should be that whenever the finished product is on the free list or bears a low rate of duty the raw materials entering into it should also be on the free list or also bear a low rate of duty. The only rational doctrine on the subject consonant with the Constitution and consonant with honesty and fairness is that duties should be fairly and honestly laid for governmental purposes only, sufficient to raise revenue to support the Government honestly and economically administered, bearing most heavily upon luxuries, more lightly upon necessaries, and not at all upon those few articles of general use and prime necessity with the revenues from which the Treasury may be able to dispense.

The argument for a line of demarcation between raw material and finished product always offered by protectionists, and, strangely enough, often concurred in by people who oppose protection, is that if the manufacturers can buy their raw material cheaply they can sell the finished product more cheaply. Of course that is axiomatic, but will they, and do they? Have they ever done so? The truth is, they take all that trade conditions will bear, and conscience does not hurt them because conditions are artificial and produced by unjust and partisan laws. Buying cheaply does not prevent them from selling for as high a price as their wares will command. It simply broadens the zone of their profits. It enables them to graft in both directions, to rob those to whom they sell and those from whom they buy, and they never fail to do what the law permits them to do for their own profit.

This doctrine received its most signal if not its initial emphasis from an effort to convert to the Democratic Party the protectionists of the East by changing the creed of the Democratic Party to suit the interests of these protectionists and tempting their cupidity when appeals to their principles appeared to be unavailing. The experiment failed, but forcibly reminded me of the words of the Blessed Master about proselyting:

> Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves.

It is safer for Democrats to avoid trying to be doctrinaires drawing artificial, unorthodox lines of distinction and stick to the good old doctrine that all things are subject to taxation for the support of the government, and for nothing else; but that government should discriminate in arranging rates below the best revenue-raising point, so as to treat luxuries and necessaries properly and wisely, sparingly using the free list for the beneficial purpose of helping the people to articles of general use and prime necessity.

The fundamental doctrine seems to be ignored, or never mentioned, to wit: That the proper or best revenue-raising rate should be the maximum rate ever to be considered. No duty laid above the best revenue-producing rate is levied for any constitutional purpose, but is levied for the bald, bare purpose of prohibiting competition and protecting domestic favorites in robbing their fellow men. A Democratic tariff system, constructed upon proper Democratic principles, would contain no rate higher than was adjudged to be the best revenue-producing rate, and the range would be from that down to nothing.

It would be Utopian, however, to hope to adopt such a system during the present Congress, and the people ought not to be deluded into anticipating any such result. Statesmen and newspapers have not been careful to advise the public of the true situation, that the Democrats control only one House of Congress. The Republicans have the Senate, and all the Republicans in that body, though differing in detail as to the items they want protected and what they want on the free list, are every one protectionists and every one of them would vote against an ideal Democratic tariff bill. It should also be remembered that the President is Republican, and that he is pledged to sign no bill that interferes with protection. So it is idle for the people to hope for a Democratic measure during the present Congress. We may succeed in having some things put on the free list. We may succeed in reducing some of the greatest enormities in the rates of the existing law. If we fail to do anything, the country will understand, by following the proceedings of this House, that the fault shall not lie with us. A great many in high places, and a great many in this House lately in high places, have already suffered bitter disappointment from the discovery that this House can do business. Still greater surprises await them. "Those who came to scoff may yet remain to pray." While we must proceed with prudence, endeavoring in moderation to select those lines of action which give promise of some success, we expect that our record will make it clear to the country that if relief does not come through the present Congress its failure will be due to two obstacles to that relief, one at the other end of the Capitol and the other at the other end of the Avenue. Both of these obstacles can be removed by the people at the next election, and if a complete political revolution is necessary in order to secure relief, the people can and will complete the work so well done in part last November and come into their own after the next election by choosing a majority of Democrats in the Senate and a Democratic President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"CLARK and reform" is a slogan which has placed the Democrats in control of this House, and the same gonfalon may lead the hosts of Democracy to such a signal and glorious victory that the people, for the first time in many years, realizing the blessings of old-fashioned honesty and Democracy in control, may remain awake to perpetuate their own rule, their own power, prosperity, and happiness.

Let not our defeated and demoralized adversaries "mourn as those who have no hope." [Laughter.] There are compensating considerations in almost every event or situation. This bill will afford my distinguished friends from Michigan and Pennsylvania, those two eminent freetraders, Messrs. FORDNEY and DALZELL and others, consolation for their failure to graft this free list on to the reciprocity bill, which they so fondly hoped and earnestly tried to do. Yea more, it will reach farther than Canada, and give them a world-wide field from which to gather all these articles free of duty.

I admonish them also not to indulge in pessimistic predictions about the imaginary wreck and ruin to follow Democratic legislation. The real friends of the people are at the helm in this House, the legitimate successors of those who founded this Government, and for 60 years conducted it to greatness and glory. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If after the next election they also control the other House and occupy the White House, no legitimate business will suffer thereby, no honest industry will be injured. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Graft has no vested right. Inequality has no just claim to immortality, although tolerated for a long time, able to evade justice or even fostered by unjust law. We do not purpose to take away what men have accumulated, nor make distribution thereof, nor declare a popular dividend from their overgrown fortunes. That used to be a favorite stock-in-trade slander. It has now become a stale joke, and the people will yet make of it "a hiss and a byword." We do, however, believe that fair and honest conditions may be to some extent restored so that honesty and industry and merit may have a fair show. Instead of fattening a few favorites we may encourage general prosperity, but present favorites will not be ruined nor starved. Compelled by competition, they will sell to their neighbors as cheaply as to foreigners and strangers, which, under protection, they never do; but they will still enjoy handsome profits and at the same time control a permanent and more agreeable patronage, for neighbors who trade because they are pleased and not because under compulsion will prove far more valuable customers. Then both the favorites and their customers, being able to bring home goods from other countries, by reason of reduced import duties, can alike sell all their surplus throughout all the world. No longer will business stagnate, with factories idle and warehouses bursting with goods waiting for impoverished domestic customers to earn money enough to buy a few more goods at exorbitant prices.

Their goods can then go out by every sail, with every breeze, and on every steamer to the remotest parts of the earth, to be profitably exchanged for the products of every people and every clime, thereby loading returning argosies with a wealth of valuable commodities, to mingle again with the products of our own people, effecting other profitable exchanges, to the common prosperity of all. What we need commercially is to trade with all the world. We are able to challenge the whole world to competition in all things. We can not, however, trade with people who have nothing to sell. They can not buy what we have unless they can sell what they produce. "We can not always sell to people from whom we buy nothing," was the last and wisest remark President McKinley ever made about the tariff. It has been far-reaching in its effect. It is equally true that we can not buy from other people unless our rates of duty are reasonable enough to enable us to bring the goods home after we buy them. Our prosperity and glory are in our own hands. We Democrats of this House propose to do our duty, challenging the other House and the President to do theirs, and confidently leaving the result to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I have felt some reluctance in asking time to participate in this debate, as there are many others of longer service and more experience who are better able to shed light upon this important question, but I justify my action in asking the indulgence of the House for a few minutes by the fact that the constituency that I represent, which is one of the largest represented upon this floor, is deeply interested in the proposed legislation.

This House has recently passed what is known as the Canadian reciprocity bill, and the pending bill is now by some called its companion, but is generally known as the farmers' free-list bill.

The course of the reciprocity bill has probably been the most unique in the history of congressional legislation. It originated in the White House with a Republican Chief Executive, and this extra session of Congress has been called by the President for the express and lone purpose of having it passed by Congress. It was here opposed by many of the past and present leaders of his party upon the floor of the House, and a majority of them recorded their votes against it; but it had the indorsement of a Democratic caucus of this House and its passage was strongly urged by the leaders and supported by the votes of almost the entire membership of the Democratic majority. One of the questions that to-day agitates the public mind is whether the Republican President has gone Democratic or whether the Democratic House of Representatives has gone Republican.

The debate upon the reciprocity bill was interesting and instructive, sometimes surprising, if not amusing. One of its surprises was to observe many of the old-time and unregenerated "stand-pat" protectionists of eastern manufacturing centers, with no farmers in their districts, pleading for its defeat, for fear that it may hurt the farmers, while many of the ablest and most faithful Representatives in this House from the agricultural districts of the South and West, who represent farmers and who are more familiar with their conditions, their crops, and their markets, have strongly advocated the bill as a good thing for their constituents.

The two chief arguments of the opponents of reciprocity in this House and in the press have been, first, that it will lower the price of farm products, which I hope is a mistake. The other is, that it is an abandonment of the protective policy and will destroy the Republican Party.

Some apprehension has been felt and expressed by the farmers of our country as to the probable effect of the proposed law upon prices of farm products, which, in my opinion, found its origin among the designing alarmists of other callings and other interests who are beneficiaries of the present high tariff laws, the repeal of which they fear that bill may be the forerunner. It was shown in the discussion of that bill in this House that the Lumber Trust, of which Mr. Edward Hines, of Chicago, is the president, has been very active in its efforts to arouse the farmers in opposition to that bill. The circular letter sent out contains the following clause:

> Will you and your connections kindly wire the following Congressmen at Washington quick, urging them to vote against the Canadian reciprocity agreement?

It would be hard for me to understand or to believe that his activity in this was inspired by unselfish motives or by his love for the farmers rather than by a selfish regard for his own interests as the head of a great trust that has been a curse to every farmer and every home builder in the land.

I live in an agricultural district in which the majority of the people are engaged or directly interested in agricultural pursuits, and all others of our citizenship are indirectly interested in their success, as they recognize the fact that the prosperity of all other callings depends upon the success and prosperity of the farmers. As their Representative in this House, I would not of my own volition cast any vote that I thought would do them the slightest injury or injustice. I have myself for 30 years had raised upon my farm corn and wheat and sold them in the markets.

Some of my constituents have expressed opposition and others have expressed their approval of the reciprocity bill, and the responsibility was left upon me to determine what action I should take. I voted for the bill for the following reasons:

First. I believed a majority of my constituents were in favor of it, and I thought it was my duty as their Representative upon this, as upon all questions upon which they are advised and express their opinion, to reflect their wishes by my vote.

Second. The Democratic caucus of this House had indorsed it and instructed me to vote for it, and, as a Democrat, I felt bound by that action, notwithstanding the fact that it originated with and was advocated by a Republican President.

Third. I gave the bill as careful consideration as I could, and was convinced that it will prove to be a benefit to the people of the district that I have the honor to represent and to the country at large, and will moreover prove to be the entering wedge that will open the way to other necessary and highly beneficial tariff reforms that will bring relief to the long-suffering and tax-ridden laborers and farmers of our country.

One of the chief grounds of alarm has been because of the proposed removal of the 25 cents per bushel tariff upon wheat and the 15 cents per bushel upon corn, and the prediction that it will reduce the price of these products to our farmers.

As wheat and corn are the chief products of the farmers of my district, I desire to say a word in answer to this prediction. When I was in law school I remember one of the professors said in his lecture to the class, "The reason of the law is the life of the law." It made a profound impression upon me at the time, and I have often thought since that this fundamental principle might be applied to other subjects. This proposed law will not cheapen the price of wheat, corn, or other farm products unless there is a reason for it, and as I read and understand the statistics and the facts there is absolutely no good reason to believe that the price of these commodities will be affected to any perceptible extent except at local points near the Canadian border. A high tariff law never raises the price of any article in this country that would not be imported here without the imposition of such tariff, and all well-informed men, and especially farmers, know that this is the largest wheat and corn growing Nation on earth, and no country under the sun can produce either wheat or corn, pay the freight upon them, even under free trade, and sell them here in competition with the American farmers. We do not need Canadian wheat or corn, we have annually a large surplus of our own, but Canada does need our corn, as that country produces but little of that article. The United States shipped to Canada in the last fiscal year 6,178,896 bushels of corn.

We must not lose sight of the fact that in giving Canada free trade upon the several articles mentioned in the proposed agreement the Canadian Government must give us free trade upon the same articles into that country.

It has been argued by the opponents of that bill that wheat is cheaper in Canada than it is in the United States. That is sometimes true in some places, and the same may be said of the different markets in the United States. May wheat is now 6 cents higher per bushel in Minneapolis than it is in Chicago; 2 cents higher in Chicago than it is in St. Louis; and 2½ cents higher in St. Louis than it is in Kansas City. There is usually 2 or 3 cents difference in the price of wheat at different delivering points in the county in which I live. These differences in prices are caused by the difference in freight rates, or possibly at times by the manipulations of the markets by speculators.

But a sufficient answer to this argument is that Chicago is the principal grain market of the United States, and all other markets in the country are largely controlled by it. Winnipeg is the principal wheat market of Canada, and on last Saturday, the day after the reciprocity bill was passed in this House, the markets, as shown by the Chicago Tribune, at Winnipeg, Chicago, and St. Louis were as follows:

JULY WHEAT.	Cents.
Winnipeg	96½
Chicago	88½
St. Louis	85½

As the farmers in my district usually market their wheat in July at a price below the St. Louis market they will readily see that the Canadian price can not injuriously affect the price of their wheat, as the price as now indicated there will be 11 cents per bushel higher than the price indicated in the St. Louis market, in which we must sell, or that governs our prices.

I have made an investigation of the statistics affecting our trade with Canada during recent years prepared by the authorities of the Governments of the United States and Canada, from which I have ascertained the following facts:

In the five years ending June 30, 1910, in goods of all kinds—

We sold in Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703

These figures show that it has been beneficial to us to trade with Canada even over obstructive tariff walls that have existed, and, in my opinion, our commercial relations would be greatly improved by the removal of that unnatural and obstructive barrier.

Permit me to call attention to the statistics of the same authorities upon some specific articles in which the farmers of the country are greatly interested.

In the five years ending June 30, 1910, it appears the exchange between the two countries of certain farm products were as follows:

Wheat:
We exported to Canada	$4,442,307
Canada sold to us	766,254
Difference in our favor	3,676,053
Horses:
We exported to Canada	14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,621,874
Cattle:
We exported to Canada	1,578,170
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,585
Meat and dairy:
We exported to Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We exported to Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another unanswerable reason against this agitation for lower prices of corn and wheat. This country exports to Liverpool or other foreign markets large quantities of both these staple farm products annually. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, which is the last year for which I have been able to obtain statistics, we exported 35,853,412 bushels of corn and 66,923,244 bushels of wheat. Canada ships her surplus of wheat to the same markets, and in view of these facts I am unable to see how free trade with our neighbor across the Canadian border will lower the price of wheat to our American farmers who know that the price in the United States rises and falls with the Liverpool market. On January 18, 1894, in a speech delivered in this House by our present distinguished Member, the ex-Speaker of this House, Mr. CANNON, in answer to questions of Mr. Simpson, of Kansas, he said:

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman not admit that we are now competing in Europe with the different countries of the Old World for the sale of our wheat?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with Roumania, Russia, and India.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the gentleman will admit that the price we receive there fixes the price of our articles not only in the United States but in the foreign markets?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; all prices are regulated by the prevailing market, wherever it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 10 minutes more time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. The present able Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, of the agricultural State of Iowa, who in his present position has done so much for the farmers, and to whom many of them have learned to look for advice in things pertaining to agriculture, in a letter to the National Grange, written on February 9, 1911, among other things, said:

There is a difference of 10 or more cents a bushel on wheat and other cereals between the markets of Winnipeg and Minneapolis, but this difference is fully explained by the lack of transportation and elevator facilities and by the greater difficulty that the Canadian farmer now has in point of economic carriage from the Northwest to Liverpool, where by the sale of the world's surplus the price of wheat is fixed for the world. To let the wheat of the Northwest come down to Minneapolis and Chicago will steady the price of wheat, will prevent its fluctuations, will make much more difficult speculation, and will furnish us greater insurance against the short crops and high prices. But that it will in the end, or substantially, reduce the price of wheat, which is fixed for the world in Liverpool, no one familiar with the conditions can assert.

From the investigations that I have made, I believe that the proposed Canadian reciprocity law, if it goes into effect, rather than to prove injurious to my constituents, will prove to be a benefit to them and to the whole country. Canada produces some things that we need better than we can produce them; we produce some things that her people need better than they can produce them; and for the mutual benefit of both countries there should be, in my opinion, a freer exchange of commodities between them. Canada should be our natural ally in sympathy and in commerce, and in every laudable aspiration that will tend to promote human progress and human happiness.

But we do not propose to stop with the passage of the reciprocity bill. This House offers to you to-day this bill known as the farmers' free-list bill, which proposes to place upon the free list agricultural implements, leather, harness, boots and shoes, fencing wire, sewing machines, salt, and other articles of general use among the farmers, which is intended and which unquestionably will if it becomes a law give them great relief in the prices of these articles.

Many of our friends upon the other side of the House in this debate have professed great sympathy and friendship for the farmers, and I do not—I never do—question the sincerity or the veracity of any man, not even a Republican, but I confess that my faith in the sincerity of their professions will be greatly strengthened when they vote for this bill, which is offered for the purpose of giving the farmers of our country relief against the exorbitant prices which they have been compelled to pay under high protective tariff laws for many of the most important farm implements and other commodities necessary to them and their families. Many of these articles of prime necessity have in the past and are now being shipped abroad and sold in foreign lands cheaper than to our farmers at home.

The Democratic Party in presenting and supporting this bill is not only right but is consistent. It has for a half century favored a low tariff for revenue, while the Republican Party has stood for a high tariff for protection by prohibiting or discouraging importations from other countries, thereby building up and fostering monopolies and trusts by unnecessary taxation of all the people. The Democratic Party to-day favors either a low revenue tariff or free trade upon the necessaries of life, such as farm implements, clothing, and other articles that enter into the home of the humble citizen to sustain life or to make its inmates comfortable and happy.

Permit me to say to our friends on the other side of this House who so eloquently plead for the farmers' welfare a few days ago, when there seemed to be some doubt about the effect upon them by the then proposed legislation, we invite you now, we entreat you to-day, to stand by the farmers in your support of this bill, under which there is no doubt about the beneficial effects to the farmers.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] in his address last week, which I am pleased to say was one of the best I have ever heard in this House, said his party promised the people in its last national platform that if successful it would revise the tariff and lower the duties, but that after the election, in the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law, the party violated its promise to the people, and the broken party pledge led to party disaster and party defeat and gave us a majority on this side of the House. This was a frank and an honest confession from an able and an honest man, and to him and his political associates we offer to-day a chance to correct some of the defects of that law and to remedy some of the omissions of the Republican Party in its disregard of its own promises and its failure to heed the just demands of the people.

We are warned by some of our doubting friends upon the Republican side of this House that this bill will never become a law, but I do not know whether this is a friendly prediction or an unfriendly threat, but I do know that it should not deter us, as the representatives of the people, in the discharge of our duty to them. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

I am not a prophet, but it requires none to foresee that this bill will pass this Democratic House, and if it is defeated in the Republican Senate or vetoed by a Republican Chief Executive the responsibility will rest with the Republican Party and the condemnation of the American people will follow. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am a peaceful man and I come from a peaceful State. Arguments in Massachusetts are seldom driven home by honied eloquence or by the persuasiveness of a shotgun. In neither respect can I adjust myself to that school of oratory which is so much admired in the great metropolis of Scotland Neck in the second district of North Carolina. [Laughter on the Republican side.] When I am smitten upon the right cheek I turn the other also, but in turning it I endeavor to propitiate the good genius of Scotland Neck with a few well-chosen compliments. If I were to be tried for my life I should seek as my counsel the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]; that is to say, I should seek him as my counsel if I were guilty. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would do wisely, for I have kept many a Republican from off the gallows. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman please address the Chair? [Laughter.] I know of no man who better than he can invert the true appearance of facts. I have observed in the gentleman—or I think that I have observed, though I may be in error—that quality so valuable to jury lawyers, or at all events to jury lawyers in criminal cases and to jury lawyers who act for the plaintiff in tort cases, that quality—and how shall I express my meaning, Mr. Chairman, in parliamentary terms? Let us see, that tendency unconsciously—and observe the word "unconsciously"—to blur the line of demarkation which marks the division where fact ends and imagination begins. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that that is parliamentary language. You who were here last year remember how the Member from North Carolina delivered his magnificent oration after my poor effort on the tariff. He "answered" my arguments, as he euphemistically expressed it the other day; but there are all sorts of answers—sound answers, unsound answers, and evasive answers.

I have never known anyone so brave as to deny that the arguments of the gentleman from North Carolina are full of sound, and it would be impolite if I were to say that they are evasive. Do you remember last year how the cold perspiration bespangled your brows when he described to you, with that benignant smile for which he is so famous, how "dear little children"—and he said "little children" in such a tender, motherly sort of way [laughter]—how dear little children, in consequence of our protective system, at that very instant in the great cities of New York and Chicago were engaged in searching through dung heaps to find morsels of food wherewith to make soup? And yet, Mr. Chairman, neither the health authorities nor the charitable organizations of those two great cities have ever been able to discover those "dear little children." I am forced to the conclusion that really they were dear little Democrats in embryo practicing for future efficiency in the art of muckraking. [Laughter and applause.]

Oh, how warmly the gentleman shook hands with himself, and you remember how he washed his hands with invisible soap in imperceptible water when he congratulated the people of his political faith that they had just sworn an oath to abstain from the consumption of meat as a device for lowering its price. You remember how the pæans of joy arose from the Democratic side because at last Democrats had been found to follow the example of those great New Englanders who refused to drink the tea that George the Third had taxed. Alas, for your pæans of joy, alas for that melodious war whoop which rises in the beautiful valley between the forks of the Pedee River in South Carolina and echoes here from time to time to punctuate your pæans! Alas, for all those expressions of joy! New England in the days of George the Third remained on the wagon of abstinence, while New England's imitators, a very few days after they had made their eternal vow, ignominiously fell off.

And now, Mr. Chairman, this Scotland Neck Peter the Hermit, after courageously leading a crusade so short a time ago to prove to the American people that farm produce is cheaper in Canada than it is at home, to-day is countermarching his magnificent army to prove that it is not. "Codlin's your friend, not Short," his seductive voice whispers to the American farmer, but the American farmer replies in Kemble's famous words:

When late I attempted your pity to move,
Why seemed you so deaf to my prayers?
Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But why did you kick me down stairs?

A SOP TO CERBERUS.

No one could accuse me of overstatement if I were to assert that the American farmer had successfully restrained himself from giving any exhibition of undue enthusiasm over Canadian reciprocity. To salve his wounded feelings your privy council has brought forward a "farmers' free-trade bill," very much as some repentant darkey who had robbed my henroost might endeavor to propitiate my wrath by returning to me the feathers of the purloined fowl. So you are going to throw a sop to Cerberus. Whether or no that sop will ever reach Cerberus is a subject which I assign for debate to the accredited walking delegate of your party from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and his bo'sun's mate [Mr. HOBSON] in the affirmative, and to the representative of the unterrified Democracy of Brooklyn, N. Y. [Mr. FITZGERALD], in the negative.

But suppose, Mr. Chairman, that ultimately this sop does reach Cerberus. Do you suppose that he is going to be satisfied with the core when you have just abstracted his whole apple? I doubt if so primitive a device will serve to assuage his grief. Far rather am I of the opinion that with one of his three mouths Cerberus will swallow that core, while with the other two mouths he will bark aloud for the sweet blood of revenge. I own, to my sorrow be it said, that I am not as yet quite certain as to just whose lifeblood Cerberus is going to demand, for I am pained to acknowledge that the theft of his apple will not be consummated without Republican accomplices.

THE FUTURE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The political future of the Democratic Party does not rest upon the question as to whom you may offend or whom you may please by any particular measure. You have come into power in this House because you have persuaded the people of this country that the cost of living can be lowered without entailing reductions of wages or widespread disaster.

Whether or not your view of the situation is correct is a question which will not be settled within the next two years, for it is idle to suppose that a Republican Senate and a Republican President will give you full sway in carrying out a doctrine which is at complete variance with the beliefs of the Republican Party. But if in 1912 the people of this country remain of the same views which they expressed in 1910 they will give you control of all three branches of this Government. We Republicans can not evade that result by any timid, stern chase in the path which you so long have followed. That is as it should be. I no more blame the voter for turning out men whose doctrines no longer meet his views than I blame you Democrats for pointing out that clear duty to the voter. What I blame you for is this: You have been telling the American people that the conservative action of the Republican Party is owing to the corrupt influences of the trusts. Last year you scouted the idea that any conservative could be acting from conscientious motives.

Now, I know very well that political misrepresentation is not confined to any one side of this Chamber; but of late years political misrepresentation arising from your side has been fraught with more consequence, owing to the conspicuously unfair attitude of that part of the public press which most vociferously proclaims its impartiality. Should the people of this country give you complete control of the Government, I venture to predict that you will drastically and conscientiously destroy the protective system, as it has heretofore been known. I predict that you will enact into law some reforms which will prove beneficial and that you will enact into law even more of those unwholesome innovations of whose success the smattering sociologist is characteristically so certain.

In fact, I do not see how it can well be otherwise. The day has gone by when tariffs of "perfidy and dishonor" can be passed. The day has gone by when legislators can neglect, or even desire to neglect, the issues upon which they have been elected. I am glad that it is so. If you come into power, I hope and believe that you will prove that it is so, for in that way alone can the specter which to-day is haunting representative government be laid at rest.

For the most part, I abhor your principles. For the most part, I predict their ultimate failure in practice. But if the people give you complete control, with all your errors, with all your crudities, you can perform a prodigious service to this country. Carry out your promises, absurd as we may think them; change the laws to conform with the views which you have expressed; do those things and you will perform a service to the Nation and to the whole world, even if each and every act which you put upon the statute book shall demonstrate nothing but the folly of the parent idea in which it was conceived.

Yet, of itself, a strict adherence to your promises will not retain you in power. Your theories and your beliefs, when given the form of law, must entail success and prosperity or once again the people will turn to the men whose theories and beliefs are opposed to your own. If the future shall show that the price of that which labor produces can be lowered without interference with the remuneration of that labor itself, then your tenure of power will be long in the land. But if the future shall show, as I firmly believe will be the case, that the fiscal reforms which you are sowing can result in nothing but a crop of disasters, thence once again the country will turn to the Republican Party, purged of the abuses incident to long, untrammeled power.

AN UNEQUAL PROPOSITION.

Now, in regard to this measure itself, until I heard the revenue explanation which was given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I had it in mind to ask him why Louisiana sugar should be omitted from this free-trade bill. I concede that the reason he gave was satisfactory, to me at least; yet I can not divest my mind of the belief that there are sectional features to this bill. I turn to my Yearbook and there I find that Virginia produces iron, coal, and tobacco. Surely, those articles are much used by farmers; yet I find no mention of them in this bill. Next come the Carolinas, famous for tobacco and rice. Obviously, rice should have met the fate of other cereals. Georgia is a rice State, too. Florida is famous all over the world for its oranges and other semitropical fruits; yet not one paragraph of this bill touches her chief products. Why did those articles escape your tariff pruning? Alabama is rich in coal and iron, but coal and iron have escaped the deluge. Louisiana and Texas both produce sugar and rice, and Kentucky and Tennessee have coal, iron, and tobacco. Yet, in spite of those obvious omissions of articles which farmers use and which, if consistency is sought, should be included in a "farmer's free-trade bill"——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the gentleman know that any amount of duty on coal would not affect the value of coal in Kentucky, and does he know that there is not a pound of tobacco in the world if admitted free that would come in competition with the tobacco of Kentucky?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not know those things.

Mr. STANLEY. That is a fact.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am sorry that the Ways and Means Committee did not take the time to have hearings, so that those facts could be brought forward. I presume that in many instances such an answer as that made by the gentleman from Kentucky would be the true answer. I presume that there must be reasons for all these omissions, and I am speaking to-day with the hope that we may discover the meaning of all these unusual coincidences.

Mr. STANLEY. The only tobacco grown in Kentucky is Burley tobacco and Pryor tobacco; and Burley tobacco is not raised anywhere outside of the United States, and the dark, or Pryor, tobacco, 85 or 90 per cent of it, is exported to Europe.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, pending the presentation of the other side of the question by the Republican Members from Kentucky, I omit tobacco from my indictment so far as Kentucky is concerned.

Mr. STANLEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, in spite of all these obvious omissions from a "farmers' free-trade bill," I am not prepared to say that this measure was conceived in a spirit of sectional unfairness, but I do believe that observations taken from one part of this country alone can not insure the justice of the course of the ship of state.

Can anyone tell me why binding twine is omitted from this bill?

Mr. JAMES. Because it is already on the free list.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Binding twine is not already on the free list, except in the same sense that such agricultural implements as plows, harrows, harvesters, and so forth, are on the free list. Under paragraph 507 binding twine is only on the free list when coming from countries which charge no import duty on binding twine. On the product of countries which charge an import duty on binding twine a duty of one-half cent a pound is imposed. There is just as much reason for including binding twine in the free list in this bill as for including plows, tooth and disk harrows, and so forth.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts mean to admit that that character of a free list is a delusion and a snare?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, the gentleman knows how bills are made up. Amendments are introduced and provisos are inserted on the floor of the House. The mere fact that binding twine appears under the free list, while certain agricultural implements are included under the dutiable list, makes no difference after the two provisos have been read, except to prove that the Ways and Means Committee did not know this fact.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is always a pleasure, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts say to the House that a tariff is now charged upon binding twine?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. One-half cent a pound, under paragraph 507.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that it is admitted free now?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I did not know that it was ever imported. I supposed that it was made entirely in the United States, though I know nothing about it, because I have not looked up the facts. Does the gentleman contend that it pays a duty?

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman's Republican campaign book has bragged for a number of years that you put binding twine on the free list.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. With the approval of your campaign book, I presume.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, no; the gentleman himself admits that he is making a statement here that he does not know anything about—that he really does not know whether it is free or not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, I can read the language of paragraph 507, but I shall not do so. Any gentleman who thinks that the Ways and Means Committee were not ignorant of the facts can read it for himself. The whole debate this morning showed that the gentleman from Alabama was not aware that binding twine is dutiable.

Mr. JAMES. I wanted to find out whether or not we could get a repudiation from the gentleman of the prior claims of the Republican campaign book.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not repudiate anything; but I refer the gentleman to Imports and Duties, 1894 to 1907, during the period of the continuance of the Dingley law. See page 369:

"Binding twine from countries which impose a duty on like articles imported from the United States"; one-half cent per pound; 1898, pounds imported, 275; value in dollars, $18; duty collected, the munificent sum of $1.38.

Mr. JAMES. That was under the Dingley law. We are now living under the Payne law.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; but does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that when a paragraph in one law is maintained word for word in another law there is neither a repeal nor a change in existing law?

Mr. JAMES. I do not know that.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; we never know those things until the court decides them. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been talking about a great many things which the gentleman from Kentucky with some justice implies that I know nothing about.

Mr. JAMES. I did not intend to say that. I think the gentleman knows a great deal about things he talks about.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I now come to the question of boots and shoes, and I am ready for all comers. [Laughter.] I believe that I am correct in saying that there has always been an import duty on boots and shoes since it was first imposed in 1789. I believe I am correct in saying that for 100 years or thereabouts prior to the passage of the Payne law the duty on boots and shoes never fell below 15 per cent, or its equivalent specific duty. I know that I am correct in saying that under the Wilson Democratic tariff of 1894 the duty on boots and shoes was 20 per cent, and yet the Wilson law provided free hides. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, every peace tariff we ever had provided for free hides with the exception of the Dingley law alone.

For a large part of this long period on which there was a duty on boots and shoes I am prepared to admit that the duty was not necessary for protective purposes. At that time we were the only Nation which understood modern shoemaking, and while the duty on boots and shoes did us no good, assuredly it did no one any harm.

Foreign boots and shoes in those days, even if bounty fed, could not compete with the American product. It was impossible by artificial means to keep up the price in this country, even if the duty on boots and shoes had been 1,000 per cent. Competition in the boot and shoe trade was fierce at that time, just as it is fierce to-day. To those of you who believe that trusts and industrial combinations can maintain artificial prices behind an unduly high tariff wall—and I am quite uncertain whether economically that is so or not—but to those of you who hold that belief I beg to point out the fact that no shadow of a trust has ever existed in the shoe trade.

Five years ago on the floor of this House I showed that conditions were changing with respect to foreign shoemaking. Many a time since that day I have reiterated my views. I have pointed out the fact that the United Shoe Machinery Co. has extended its operations into foreign lands. I have pointed out the fact that this company is to-day preparing to equip a factory anywhere on earth with American machinery and American instructors. It is a fact that not long ago the United Shoe Machinery Co. equipped a factory in Helsingfors, in Finland, with new shoemaking devices, just as completely as they equipped a factory in Haverhill, Mass., at about the same time.

The Payne law cut the duty on boots and shoes from 25 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem on boots whose tops are made of calfskin and hide leather. It cut the duty to 15 per cent on boots and shoes whose tops are made of sheepskin and goatskin. At the time these reductions were made many gentlemen predicted that, in spite of the reduction, the duty was still left at a prohibitive figure. I was not of that opinion. I protested at the time that the danger mark had been passed, and in a few moments I propose to verify that prediction.

There is a vast amount of misunderstanding abroad as to what this boot and shoe paragraph in the pending bill accomplishes. Many people think it applies to all boots and shoes; they are in error. Many people believe that it applies only to farmers' shoes; they also are in error. Many people think that it does not apply to women's shoes, and they are equally mistaken. This bill admits free of duty farmers' heavy boots and shoes of the brogan class, such shoes as the farmer wears when he gets out his stock in the morning. It admits free of duty such shoes as pretty nearly all of you gentlemen have on at the present moment; that is to say, shoes with calfskin uppers or with grain uppers, patent leather shoes, and the like. All these shoes are admitted to-day at a 10 per cent duty, and this bill admits them free.

On the other hand, this bill does not admit free of duty the kind of shoes that the farmers' wives and daughters often wear, or the kind of shoes that many men with small means often wear. Sheepskin and goatskin uppers form a cheap and on the whole very satisfactory substitute for calfskin uppers. For that reason they are used in the manufacture of shoes of the less expensive grades, especially the less expensive grades of women's shoes.

All shoes of that type under the present law are admitted at 15 per cent duty, and that rate of duty remains undisturbed in the pending bill. Now, before you decide to cut the duty at all, I wish to call your attention to some interesting figures. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] this morning selected as his standard of comparison the value of shoe importations for the year of 1908. For the last year of the operation of the Dingley law he ought properly to have selected 1909, because, as you all know, those figures you get from the Treasury Department are calculated for the fiscal year. Therefore the fiscal year which ended on June 30, 1909, is the true standard of comparison, and it is that standard of comparison which I shall use. Then the gentleman from Alabama, in order to prove that there had been no increase in imports under the Payne law, took the Treasury figures for 1910. Remember that the Treasury year of 1910 began June 30, 1909, that the 10 per cent rate on boots and shoes did not go into force until October 1, 1909, and that these foreign competitors had to buy American lasts and patterns before they attacked our market. You will readily understand that it is impossible to judge the effect of the new tariff on the importation of shoes by examining figures for a period terminating on June 30, 1910, only nine months after the reductions were in full force. Accordingly, as a basis of comparison, I ask you to take the figures of the imports of the first six months of the current fiscal year, to wit, the figures from June 30, 1910, to January 1, 1911. During the year 1909, which was the last year of the operation of the Dingley law, the importation of boots and shoes amounted to $104,000. Soon after that law was passed the Boot and Shoe Trade Record of London took the matter up, saying that under the lower tariff British shoe manufacturers should be able to sell their shoes in every city from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Meetings of shoe manufacturers in England were held, and American lasts and American patterns were secured. Soon the result began to be felt.

The Eliet-Kendall Co., of Kansas City, one of the largest shoe jobbers in the country and, I think, the largest in the Southwest, placed an order with an English house. This example is being followed more and more every day, so much so that in the first six months of the current fiscal year—to wit, from June 30, 1910, to January 1, 1911—the imports of shoes into the United States were no less than $377,000. This amount, covering a period of only six months, is a great deal more than three times as much as the entire value of boots and shoes imported into this country during the last 12 months of the operation of the Dingley law. In other words, at the very inception of the foreign attack on our shoe market the importation of shoes has leaped up about 600 per cent, and yet the tide is but just beginning. In my belief, as soon as Switzerland and Germany begin to manufacture for our markets a deluge will be upon us.

I call your attention to the Daily Consular Reports of February 28, 1911, less than two months ago. I read from the report of our consul at Nottingham, England, S. M. Taylor. This is what Mr. Taylor says:

> Prior to August 5, 1909, when the present United States tariff went into effect—

He is mistaken so far as the 10 per cent duty on boots and shoes is concerned. That did not go into effect until October 1—> the annual export of boots and shoes from this district, the center of the British industry, to the United States did not exceed $500 per year, but following that date, and up to the end of the year, the exports amounted to $3,800, while for the year 1910 they amounted to $85,000. These are invoiced as "high-class walking boots and shoes." They are made on wooden lasts, made here, and in shapes and styles to suit the American demand. The machinery is of the American type, but having regard to recent legislation on patent matters, "American" machinery must now be built in England. The firm that builds this machinery works in connection with a machinery company in the United States. In general, it can be said that the products of these English-built machines, when placed on view in windows with American-made boots and shoes, are hardly distinguishable one from the other. Shipments of these goods have been made to Cincinnati, Boston (two firms), New York (five different firms), Philadelphia (two firms), San Francisco, Pittsburg, Columbus, Ohio (four firms), Chicago, Cleveland, Kansas City (six firms), and Portland, Oreg.

Now, let us look at the other side of the question.

Of course our exportation of shoes to foreign markets continues large. As a matter of fact, though it was not pointed out by the gentleman from Alabama, our exportation of shoes to foreign markets has slightly increased, although the increase, which is by no means proportional, relates principally to Cuba and Mexico. Those countries take from us nearly one-half of the shoes which we export. The other half, which mostly is exported to Europe, goes to those shops where you see signs of "American shoes." Such exports are largely intended for the consumption of American travelers journeying abroad. An American in Europe naturally prefers to buy a pair of shoes of the size, style, and fit to which he has been accustomed at home. But, are we holding our own in those countries where our chief competitors live? Let us see. I have taken from the Weekly Bulletin of April 8, 1911, the only figures I could find, figures comparing our exports for the last seven months of 1910 with our exports for the last seven months of 1909. In the last seven months of 1910 our export of shoes to England had fallen off $99,000 from the figures of 1909. During the same periods our export of shoes to Germany has fallen off $71,000, all in consequence of improved foreign shoemaking methods. In the meantime in Belgium—and Belgium is a very good example of a neutral competitive market—Great Britain is selling seven times as many shoes as we do, France is selling three times as many shoes, and Germany is selling twice as many shoes. Any man who says that the industry of shoe manufacturing is not endangered by free trade in its product is either willfully blind or else he predicates his opinion on the experience of some particular man who makes an export specialty. Now, a word to my associates on the Republican side——

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Do I understand the gentleman to say this bill will only make free the coarse, heavy shoes?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; it also makes free fine shoes, such as the gentleman has on at this moment. Every shoe whose material in chief value is derived from cattle of the bovine species, and this includes calfskin, is made free by this bill. As a matter of fact, the situation is as follows: Boots and shoes consist of a sole, a vamp, a quarter, and a top. The vamp and quarter taken together are known as the upper. Now, the material which goes into the upper and the top exceeds in value the material which goes into the sole, and therefore if the upper and top should be made of goatskin or sheepskin the shoe comes in at 15 per cent, whether this law passes or not. The point is that the chief value of the material in a shoe of this type does not come from cattle of the bovine species.

Mr. STERLING. One more question. Does the gentleman know how much it would reduce the price of shoes, assuming that the consumer paid all the tariff?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Assuming that the duty is 10 per cent, and assuming that a pair of shoes is worth $2, and assuming that the consumer pays the whole tax—which I deny—10 per cent of $2 would, of course, be 20 cents. As a matter of fact we all know that it is the middlemen who are responsible for the enormous difference between the price at which articles are imported and the price at which they are sold to the customer. As a matter of fact, out of $377,000 worth of shoes which were imported in the first six months of this fiscal year, I think just about two-thirds came in under the 15 per cent duty. I think, to be exact, about $250,000 worth came in under the 15 per cent duty.

In other words, $250,000 worth of shoes would have paid 15 per cent duty, even if the pending bill had been law at that time.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I ask the gentleman if he can state whether or not that reduction in the duty has been of any benefit to the farmers in the way of securing for them reduced prices on shoes?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell me whether the taking off of the duty on hides and the consequent rise in the price of hides for over 14 months, or whatever the length of the period was, does not present an equal paradox? I am utterly unable to answer the gentleman. I confess that when I look into the figures the middlemen's profits seem to be so enormous that I can not help feeling from time to time that all these tariff discussions proceed on a false basis.

Mr. STERLING. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think he is mistaken about the price of hides going up.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. For 14 months, nearly, I thought. Very likely I am mistaken as to the length of time.

Mr. STERLING. They went up for a short time after the passage of the Payne tariff bill, but I think hides are off now between 30 and 40 per cent.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The hides of native steers, or Texas steers, in Chicago to-day—that is, packer hides—sell from 12½ to 13½ cents.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman just stated that about two-thirds of the importations of the last six months would not have been affected in case this bill passed.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. On the supposition that during that time this bill had been the law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Could he state, approximately, about what proportion of the total manufacture of shoes—that is, shoes manufactured on machines in this country—would be affected?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No: I can not. As a matter of fact, the exact figures are these: Shoes imported during those six months, under the 10 per cent duty, such shoes as would hereafter come in free if this bill should be passed, amounted in value to $123,052. Shoes imported under the 15 per cent duty amounted in value to $254,452.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman, since hides were put on the free list and the duties on shoes reduced, has there been any reduction in the retail price of shoes?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not in the retail price. I am very glad that the gentleman brought that question up. It is almost impossible for any purchaser to tell whether shoes at retail have gone up or have gone down merely because he pays a higher or a less price in a retail store for that which he thinks is the same article which he has been in the habit of purchasing. Unless he is expert enough to dissect the shoe in order to see whether the materials of which it consists are the same as the materials of which his former purchases consisted, his opinion is valueless.

Here is the best evidence which I have been able to find: I have here the Government contract prices for the United States Army shoes. The specifications have remained the same. Therefore we have a very good comparison. Now, on black dress shoes, which are calfskin, by the way, and which would come in free, the average contract price for the Army for the year ending June 30, 1909, was $2.80 and the average price for the year ending June 30, 1910, was $2.79. Between June and November, 1910, the price was $2.68¼, and between November and December, 1910, the contract price had fallen to $2.49.9. Russet garrison shoes, which are also calfskin, averaged for the fiscal year 1909, $2.85; for the fiscal year 1910—that is, up to June 30—$2.84; dropped between June and November, 1910, to $2.81½; and dropped again, in November and December, to $2.62¾. The russet marching shoe, which is veal kip—a kip is the skin of an undersized cow or the skin of a calf—would be affected. These shoes have fallen greatly, from $2.80 to $2.58½. Gymnasium shoes have fallen from $1.92 to $1.69. That is the best evidence which I can give any of these gentlemen, because the figures are accurate for the purchase of shoes on the same specifications.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I believe the gentleman made the statement that he was open to all comers, and therefore I would like to ask him from whom he quotes those figures?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I quote those figures from A. F. Schenkelberger, who has been an advocate of freer trade in hides and leather goods for many, many years and is a strenuous tariff revisionist. His figures were prepared and sent to me to disprove a statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Schenkelberger is an expert, who used to be, I think, one of the publishers of the Shoe and Leather Reporter or else the Boot and Shoe Recorder.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Is it not a fact that Hermann & Co. absolutely control, after freezing out every other competitor in the United States, the manufacture of shoes for the Army and Navy of the United States?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I have never heard of Hermann & Co. in my life, and I am probably somewhat familiar with the boot and shoe trade.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Why, they are gentlemen engaged in the business in the city of Boston, Mass.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I say to the gentleman that I have never heard of such a manufacturer or dealer in my life, in Boston or elsewhere. I do not, of course, say that he does not exist, but——

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I shall be at liberty, then, in the near future, to show to the gentleman that they have had absolute control of the shoes manufactured in this country for the Army and Navy, and that they have frozen out competitors that I know of, who have lost out, and to-day are bankrupt owing to the fact that this firm of Hermann & Co. have used their influence with the Government representatives of the United States, or those in control of the Government of the United States have used their influence to freeze out competitors and have placed them on the blacklist, so to speak, and have even gone so far as to give money so that other firms may not be competitors after freezing them out.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is that a question?—because it may take me some time to discover the question mark. The gentleman's statement is an impeachment of the Government authorities.

Mr. DALZELL. It is a matter that has to do with the executive departments.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman's suggestion is clearly an indictment of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and his remedy is a bill of impeachment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated heretofore that simultaneously the United Shoe Co. equipped a factory in Norway and one in Haverhill, Mass., with the same kind of machinery?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is practically what I said, but it is not exact. They equipped in Helsingfors, in Finland, a factory with every machine which was then in current use in Haverhill, and——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; in Haverhill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And they stand ready to-day to equip any factory in any part of the world with any shoemaking devices without any preference of or priority for this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time would the gentleman desire?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I just want to make a little peroration for the benefit of my constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Then I yield to the gentleman whatever additional time he requires.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman makes his peroration, I would like to ask him another question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. This is not for the benefit of my constituents.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If that is so, the factory at Haverhill would have absolutely no advantage over the factory in Finland, either as to machinery or processes of manufacture?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not if the manufacturer in Finland keeps his establishment up to date. I fancy if you take Nuremberg as an example instead of Helsingfors you would have a parallel case. I have no doubt that Nuremberg gets modern machinery just as quickly as Haverhill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the only advantage possible in the manufacture of shoes would be solely as to the wages of labor in the shoe factory?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; that and such things as the cost of shoe thread and leather and the various other supplies that go into the making of shoes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the principal difference, is it not—the cost of labor?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; the cost of labor in the factory and the cost of putting together the bricks to build what we call a factory. Our factories cost a vast amount of money to build, and the manufacturers are obliged to carry an immense amount of debt covering the cost of the buildings, or else they must pay a very high rental.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That also involves the cost of labor?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes; that is the cost of labor, in one form or another.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The figures which the gentleman gave are those which the Government pays on Government contracts for shoes for the Army. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that since the reduction in the rate of duty on shoes by the Payne tariff bill somebody, either the retailer or middleman or somebody else, has absorbed the amount of that reduction, so that the purchaser pays just as much now for shoes as he did two years ago?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think that is so in the main, but it is hard to say anything positive about it unless you see your shoe dissected. You know the average man usually demands a $2.50 or $3 shoe, such as he has had before. Of course, when the cost of findings goes down competition forces the manufacturer to put in a little better material. On the other hand, when the cost of findings rises, the shoe is skimped. Unless you are an expert you can not very well say whether you are buying a better shoe or a worse shoe at the same price.

Mr. OLMSTED. So far as I am concerned, I can say that they are apparently the same kind of shoe, and I paid more for them this year than I paid in 1909.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Certainly, in many instances retail prices have gone up a good deal in that grade of footwear.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DIFENDERFER]?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I am prepared to verify what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has already stated. I myself have been wearing a certain grade of shoes for a number of years. It had been my custom for a long while to go to the same store, and last October I went into the store and laid down a $5 bill for a pair of the same shoes that I had been wearing previously, and I was informed that they were 50 cents a pair higher. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has had the same experience.

But in connection with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has said, I would like to ask this question: Whether it is not a fact that when specifications are issued for a certain grade of Army shoes Shrewsbury leather is indicated in the specifications?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I have not the slightest knowledge of that.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I will say to the gentleman that that is the case, and in a case like that they can certainly make their price, because they control the Shrewsbury output of leather.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I have been here a great many years, and I have had a great many complaints from individual constituents accusing the various departments of this Government of drawing specifications in order to favor particular persons. Upon investigation, without exception, I have found that my constituents were mistaken in the premises. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he will go to the War Department and discuss the matter with the Secretary of War, will find that there is an adequate explanation.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. That adequate explanation would only consist in this, that under a test of other leather, known as Calumet leather, by the department, they found that it was better than the Shrewsbury leather that had been corraled by the company making Army shoes. Now, if that is true—and I think I stand in a position to prove that that is correct—then these premises are not well taken.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is nearly 6 o'clock. I am getting hungry and I am not going to have my peroration cut out or have it printed in the RECORD with the words "Not delivered on the floor of the House" on the face of it.

TO REPUBLICANS—THE CORN LAWS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

To you, my associates of the Republican Party who intend to vote for this bill, I have a few words to say. In my heart I do not blame you. Your farmers have been deprived of their protection and they refuse to buy in a protected market. If this were a "fisherman's free-trade bill" it might be I who would be voting for it and you who would be upholding the protective doctrine. I can not refrain from inviting your attention to a great historic parallel.

In 1841 Sir Robert Peel became premier of Great Britain, at the head of the conservative party, which was then avowedly the party of protection, as it is to-day in a less degree. Sir Robert and the conservative party had come into power on the issue of maintaining the protective system.

Bad harvests ensued; Great Britain rang with complaints of the "high cost of living." Whether protection was at fault, whether the situation was but temporary, Sir Robert must needs yield those doctrines which he had preached so long. By a coalition between the Whig Party and the Peel wing of the Conservative or Protection Party the repeal of the corn laws of Great Britain was brought about. At once the whole protective edifice began to crumble. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The British farmer had been deprived of his protection, and he would no longer tolerate the system. But how about Sir Robert and the Conservative Party? Within one month he was driven from power and for many and many a year his party was involved in his ruin.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I can not be further interrupted. I have yielded as much as I am going to.

Mr. STANLEY. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy, and I do not wish to interrupt him. I simply wish to inquire whether this is a peroration or a prophecy.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Let us hope that present-day events may deviate from that memorable historic parallel. It may be, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has so solemnly said, that resistance to this bill will empty many a seat in the Senate of the United States. It may be that it will empty the presidential chair. It may well be that my whole course on protection may empty my seat. If so, amen! We must yield to the will of the people. It is right that we should be superseded if our doctrines no longer meet their views; but I pray to heaven that Sir Robert Peel's example may be repudiated. I pray to heaven that no lust for the feeble continuance of a show of power may ever induce the Republican Party to abandon the principles which it has maintained for 50 years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CARY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6730) to authorize the leasing of the Batan Island Military Reservation for coal-mining purposes, and the same was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Census, reported the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. No. 12), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he expects to call this bill up to-morrow or to wait until after the end of this tariff debate?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not expect to call it up to-morrow, but I want to call it up as soon as I can.

Mr. DALZELL. Unless by a two-thirds vote, Calendar Wednesday can not be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly there will be no opposition to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman says there will be none?

Mr. MANN. I think there will be none.

The SPEAKER. There is no business on that calendar.

Mr. DALZELL. Unless Calendar Wednesday is dispensed with by a two-thirds vote that bill would be the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I take it there will be no objection whatever to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. This being a privileged bill, it would not be in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure it is a privileged bill; but I do not make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose there would be nothing in the way of this bill, but I do not expect to call it up to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 26, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Long Beach Harbor, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 27); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Lewis River, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 28); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of St.

Louis River, Wis. and Minn. (H. Doc. No. 29); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

4. A joint letter from the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster General in regard to a Federal building being erected at Oneida, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 30); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. Res. 13) for investigation of expenditures in the State Department, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 11), which said resolution and report were laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3404) granting a pension to Andrew M. Jordan; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 3538) for the relief of Timothy Donahoe; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 5283) for the relief of the estate of Isaac Winston, deceased; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 5452) for the relief of Elizabeth Lynch; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON: A bill (H. R. 7251) to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on the Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LANGHAM: A bill (H. R. 7252) to provide for the erection of a public building at Kittanning, Pa.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 7253) providing for the adjustment and payment of accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOON of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 7254) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7255) to determine powers of United States judges as to instructions to juries; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7256) to amend sections 4924 and 4927 of the Revised Statutes, relating to patents; to the Committee on Patents.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7257) authorizing juries to fix punishment of defendants convicted in United States courts in certain cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7258) recognizing the military service of and giving pensionable status under all pension laws of the United States to persons serving under United States officers as home guards, militia, or other provisional troops during the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7259) granting right of way for road through Government reservation north of National Cemetery, Chattanooga, Tenn.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 26, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Father, soul from whom all blessings flow, feed us with the bread of Heaven, that we may be strong of mind, pure of heart, fearless of action, ever ready to follow whereso-ever Thou dost lead in the spirit of Him who died that we might live. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are no bills on the calendar to be considered on Calendar Wednesday. I therefore move that the House suspend operations under the rule that brings up bills on Calendar Wednesday to-day.

The SPEAKER. It was held by Speaker CANNON that under the circumstances in which we find ourselves, it did not require any motion to dispense with Calendar Wednesday. The Chair thinks it was a good ruling and a matter of common sense that that rule should be considered like any other.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if that is the ruling of the Chair, I withdraw my motion, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements and other articles.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4413, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] such time as he desires.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the minority, in his assault upon the farmers' free-list bill. The gentleman is always entertaining, quite as often technical, generally critical, most generally hypercritical, and he did not deviate from those usual tendencies. [Laughter.]

He asked the mighty question with the triumphant air of the puzzler, "What is an agricultural implement?" Mr. Chairman, it only shows the decadence of the once great Republican Party that they would elevate to the lofty station of minority leader one who admitted without shame that he did not know what an agricultural implement was. [Laughter.] Why, he says, "What are meats?" I will tell you what meats are and what meats were placed on the free list for. Meats are necessary articles of food and were placed on the free list in order to dissolve those nonmeat-eating Republican clubs that were organized all over the United States in 1907 under the benign reign of Republicanism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Go ask the hungry people of your own city of Chicago, where they had to organize these nonmeat-eating clubs under the prosperity of the grand old Republican Party and its 1907 panic. They can tell you what meats are.

And the purpose of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is that whenever the Beef Trust takes control of the American market and forces the price of meat up so that the people of this country are forced to combine themselves into clubs resolving that they will not eat meat because the price is so high they can not buy it. This bill lets in meat from every part of the civilized world to compete with one of the products of Republicanism, the Beef Trust, that is organized and in control of the markets in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My friend's speech got so dry that he was forced to undertake to prove that cereal foods consisted of Kentucky whisky. [Laughter.] I want to say to my friend from Illinois that no man that has ever eaten these dry eatables ever once suggested that they were in any way comparable with Kentucky whisky. [Laughter.]

But our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] undertook to tell us that this bill was sectional. I want to say to you gentlemen on that side of the House that you have played that old sectionalism gag out and it will not work. Your plea of sectionalism in the past has borne fruit, and under this appeal to hate and prejudice you have succeeded in placing a trust on every article that the people consume. You have kept your party in power for all of these years by your plea of sectionalism, but no longer will the American people listen to this plea when it comes to dealing with things that affect every article which they consume. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was not quite fair—and he usually is—when he undertook to deal with binding twine, for he tried to create the impression upon the northern farmer, resorting to quibbling——

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I will yield presently, if the gentleman will keep that thought that he has in mind. I am discussing the question of binding twine. The gentleman said that it was not upon the free list—trying to create the impression upon the northern farmer that this old, wicked Democratic Party had come here and placed upon the free list cotton ties and cotton bagging, but had denied to the northern farmer free binding twine. What are the facts? Here they are. Binding twine is upon the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Here is the record: Shipped into this country in 1909 there were 13,558,323 pounds of binding twine, of the value of $984,914, and it did not pay one penny of tariff. Yet this argument is thrown in here, and why? Because you can not meet this bill upon its merits. Be fair in discussing these things for the consideration of the American people, 50 years removed from the struggle of heat and passion to which you would appeal, to longer bend their backs with taxation and pile upon them trusts and monopolies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1910 the imports of binding twine were 9,130,409 pounds, of the value of $681,033, which paid not one cent of tariff. And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] said, in his argument, that there was no binding twine imported, though the record I have shown conclusively proves that nearly 14,000,000 pounds of binding twine were imported in 1909, of a value of almost a million dollars. Most of the binding twine comes from Canada, some of it comes from England, but none of it pays any duty at all. And you gentlemen think sectionalism is to be considered. I am an American that refuses at this late day to predicate the hope or the argument of Democracy upon such a withered proposition as sectionalism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I might point out, if I desired to urge sectionalism as a reason for the passage of this bill, if I had no better argument upon which to base it, if I desired to appeal to prejudice between the different parts of a common great Republic—I say I might urge that you have given to the northern farmers all these years free binding twine, but have denied free bagging and ties to the southern farmers who produce cotton. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WARBURTON. I will say to the gentleman that I expect to vote for this free-list bill. [Applause on Democratic side.] I am not inimical to the bill, but there is one thing that I hope to see the gentleman himself or some gentleman on that side add to the bill, and that is free rice.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that all of the articles which we intend to place upon the free list are not included in this bill. There will be others. The gentleman can not go any further upon free articles than I can.

Mr. WARBURTON. How about free sugar?

Mr. JAMES. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of free sugar.

Mr. WARBURTON. Free rice and free sugar?

Mr. JAMES. I am in favor of free rice and free sugar, and if the time comes when we can get an income tax on the fortunes of the rich to produce revenue enough to run the Government, I am willing and will be happy to give to the people free sugar. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Well, I have introduced a bill placing sugar on the free list and rice on the free list. Will the gentleman vote for it at this session?

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will point out to me how we can secure enough revenue to run the Government of the people without creating a deficit which will wreck it, I will gladly vote for it.

Mr. WARBURTON. I would suggest a few other things, for instance, diamonds, to raise them from 10 per cent——

Mr. JAMES. I am with the gentleman. I am delighted to see the gentleman come to our side. The gentleman is an insurgent, is he not?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. I want to say to the gentleman that I welcome him to our side, because there is more joy on this side over the "tear-wet face of one repentant sinner than over the snowy robes of a hundred who are just." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. WARBURTON. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that I want to go right down the line on that proposition at this session.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, the gentleman ought to come into the Democratic Party; he ought to tear off his mask and bare his face full and fair to the breeze. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WARBURTON. I suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. JAMES. Oh, I can not let the gentleman take up all of my time. Come over on this side and I will give you my seat. [Laughter.]

I made a speech in 1909 in favor of placing sugar on the free list. There is no defense at all for the differential that exists upon sugar, and it benefits only the Sugar Trust, and I sincerely trust that we will be able, by proper economy in the expenditure of the people's money, to give to the people sugar free of any duty at all. It is used by all the people, goes into every home, and is almost a necessity of life. And I am gratified to know that 30 States in this Union have ratified the income-tax amendment to the Federal Constitution, needing but 5 more to make it a part of our organic law, a law that will do away with the technical construction of the validity of this law by the courts. An income-tax law will afford us a hundred million dollars of revenue upon the fortunes of those most able to pay to sustain the Government that most favors and prospers them. It is a law so just that for a hundred years of our history it met the approval of courts and Congresses; it is a law so just that the Master gave it to us when he announced that a tithe should be given to keep up the churches, to succor the widow and the orphan. And with this righteous tax we will be able to relieve the people of many burdens of a protective tariff, for it will supply revenue to a great degree.

Mr. Chairman, our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] went further, but he is always entertaining. He generally has fish on his mind, and yesterday he had suckers on his mind [laughter], and he tells us that we are legislating in favor of the northerners against the southerners. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the bill he voted for, the Payne-Aldrich bill—and here it is—his party in that bill placed a provision to do what? Let me read it:

> Imported salt, * * * shall, upon satisfactory proof, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, that such meats have been cured with imported salt, have refunded to them from the Treasury the duties paid on the salt so used in curing such exported meats, in amounts not less than $100.

Your party wrote into this Payne-Aldrich bill a provision that taxes the farmers of my country for the salt that goes into their bread and that cures their meats, but gives to the fish industry, which the gentleman from Massachusetts represents, and to the Beef Trust, which exists in this country, the right to go to the Treasury and get back from the Treasury the money they paid to import salt here if they used it to the extent of more than $100. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet the farmers of this country who do not buy a hundred dollars worth of salt a year for use upon their meat and upon their table have no such favoritism shown to them, but the taxes they pay into the Treasury upon salt remain there, except when they are taken out by the Beef Trust or by the fish industry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That looks to me like sectionalism if we are to consider this bill upon that line and along that path. But our distinguished friend from Iowa made his speech upon the Canadian reciprocity bill and I want to contrast it with the speech of my friend from Illinois. You gentlemen are awfully hard to please. Our friend from Iowa argued with eloquence when the Canadian reciprocity bill was under consideration. He said, "You put cattle on the free list; people do not eat cattle, they eat meat." My friend, Mr. MANN, comes right along and says, "Why, you put meat on the free list and leave cattle off the free list." The criticism of the gentleman from Iowa to this side was that we let cattle in free, we let hogs in free, we let sheep in free, but we do not let in free the beef and pork. The criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is that we let in free the beef and pork, but do not let cattle in free. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is merely an evidence of the general tendency of the Republican Party to criticize without foundation, and I want to ask you gentlemen this thing: You have written a platform. I do not think you will ever do it again [laughter on the Democratic side], especially not this one, but here it is:

The Republican Party declares unequivocally for a revision of the tariff by a special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President—

Of course, I am too kind to comment upon that. I never believed in striking a man when he was down or hitting something that was dead, and I shall not refer to your violation of this promise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your Republican platform of 1908 continues:

And commends the steps already taken to this end in the work assigned to the appropriate committees of Congress, which are now investigating the operation and effect of those schedules. In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

You wrote that, did you not? I know most of you are ashamed of it, but your party wrote that into your platform. What does that mean? That you will place upon the bending backs of the farmers of this country who feed this world the burden of giving to the manufacturers of this country a profit. A profit—you say a reasonable profit, but who decides what is a reasonable profit? Are we to conclude that a reasonable profit in this country creates millionaires with fortunes so big they can not give them away? But you place upon these toilers, these tillers of the soil, the burden of giving to these men a profit. I come in their name and ask you not to guarantee to them a profit but to take the brutal hand of oppressive taxation off the tools with which they toil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Will you do that? Will you place yourselves in the position of saying: I will place upon the farmers of this country the burden of paying a profit by tariff taxation to the manufacturers, and I will not even take the tariff tax, the burden of monopoly, off of the plow, the harrow, and those things that he uses to produce the food without which the people would starve? The drought may come and wither, the frost may come and kill, storms may come and destroy the farmer's growing crop, he who toils from dawn till dark, but no Republican platform yet has ever offered to him a reasonable profit or any profit or any aid in his business. If the farmer's business does not pay, no taxing law is at his command, advocated by republicanism, to take from others enough to give him a profit or even to give him a living. The taxgatherer comes just the same to his door, the mortgage holder demands payment; and I say it is un-American under our system or any other system in existence among free people to tax one class to make the other rich or to tax one class to give another class profit.

I expect to see you northern Republicans, Republicans from New York, Massachusetts, from Ohio, and other States, when you vote, cast that vote to tax the things with which the farmer labors, and then attempt to write, and stand for its enforcement, an iniquitous provision in law that wrings from his pocket a profit to pour into the laps of the manufacturers, trusts, and monopolies. That is the position you gentlemen are in upon this tariff bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] took up the farmers' free-list bill and criticized it. He said that under this provision allowing fencing wire to come in free, telegraph and telephone wire could be imported under the same provision, coming in as fencing wire. I want to examine that and see whether it is true or not. Here is the language:

Barbed fence wire; wire rods; wire strands; wire rope; wire, woven or manufactured, for fencing; and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Now, would the gentleman from Illinois, if he had to construe that as a lawyer, put a cat's eye in his head and come looking around for small insects in the construction of a provision of that sort? Would the gentleman from Illinois stake his reputation as a lawyer—and he is a good one—upon such a technical and far-fetched construction of a passage in this law as that? The gentleman from Illinois knows that telegraph wire and telephone wire is much larger wire than fencing wire. The gentleman from Illinois knows that it is much more costly than fencing wire, and under the glorious Republican prosperity our farmers have not reached that position yet when they have got money enough to fence their farms with telephone and telegraph wire. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican Party, so long accustomed to construing everything in favor of monopoly, might, in looking for some place to assist some of their favorite concerns, distort, contort, and twist an honorable, plain, manly construction of it in favor of the farmer away from him, so as to aid some of the monopolies engaged in telegraph and telephone pursuits. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But you will have to base your objection upon something more tenable than that in order to meet the approval of the American people.

The gentleman made another argument in regard to "agricultural implements." That very language is included in your own tariff bill, namely, the words "agricultural implements." Why did you not make objection then? Why, the gentleman was one of the wheel horses upon the Republican side in favor of the Republican tariff bill, but I never heard any technical construction about what an "agricultural implement" is. Some on your side complain because we are too broad, and others because we are not broad enough; but I will tell you now that there will be no trouble in the construction of this bill when it comes up for the consideration of those gentlemen that you pay high salaries to for the purpose of saying what the language of this bill means.

Now, let us go to your free list. You have a free list in the Payne bill, and I want to call your attention to some of the items. I want to contrast what the Democratic Party stands for as a free-list bill and what the Republican Party stands for as a free-list bill.

On the Republican free list you have acorns. Now, I am not surprised at that, because the "policy of the Republican Party" has created so many hogs in this country that you have to import acorns in order to feed them here. [Laughter.]

But we, instead of giving acorns to the hogs, turn and give flour and meal to the people who need them to eat. You give "broken bells" to the consumers of this country. They will ring false notes, but no more false than the notes you have rung on that side. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But we offer the farmer, instead of broken bells, fencing wire with which to fence his farm.

Another thing you give on the Republican free list—Payne-Aldrich bill—to the people, and they are grateful for this, and you are entitled to lasting credit for this item which you place upon the free list, namely:

Dried blood, not specially provided for.

[Laughter.]

But the Democratic party in this bill says: "We will not force you to eat dried blood, but we will give you beef and veal, and pork, and something that a man can eat, upon the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your free list provides for the admission without any tariff of catgut and wormgut, but we offer upon our free list to the people cereal food without any taxation at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The next article I find here on the Republican free list is fossils. I thought if there was anything in the world that we had an overabundance of in this country it was fossils. I thought that if there was anything in this country that afflicted the Republican Party it was fossils, and I thought surely you would not invite any importation of them by placing them upon the free list. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

You gentlemen do not seem to learn, as you go along, the necessities of the people. But the Democratic Party, instead of fossils, offers to the wives and mothers of the Republic sewing machines upon the free list. You placed needles upon the free list. You were willing that they might tear their fingers and wear out their eyes using needles, which you did not have the heart to tax. We place sewing machines upon the free list. You placed fish skins upon the free list, and I do not believe that would have been done if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] had been here. We give them agricultural drills. You placed old junk upon the free list. We give them bagging for cotton; boots and shoes. You placed leeches upon the free list. [Laughter.] I could excuse the Republican Party for placing even fossils on the free list, but how on earth you can find any satisfaction in placing leeches on the free list when we have already too many bloodsuckers in this country, is a strange thing to me. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

No criticism! Why, what a pleasant impression my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would have made if he had inquired, "What is a leech?" instead of "What are farming implements?" and if, instead of "What are meats?" he had asked the question, "What is junk?" [Laughter.]

The gentleman in discussing the question of shoes was right sharply amused by that proposition. He used a remarkable expression when I asked him the question, "Why are the shoe manufacturers selling abroad $13,000,000 worth of boots and shoes?" When I asked the gentleman from Illinois what explanation he had to make of that, "Why," he said, "I congratulate our manufacturers. They are doing well. But because they are doing well your party ought not to turn and swat them." But what does the Republican Party do?

Instead of swatting them you turn and allow them to swat the American consumer. The shoe people who went before the Ways and Means Committee said, "Give us free hides." I have no doubt that if they had known of the coming avalanche upon Republicanism and the number of hides that were to be hung up at the last election they would not have asked for free hides. [Laughter.] But they asked for hides to be placed on the free list. They said, "If you give us free hides, then we will sell boots and shoes in competition with the world and without any tariff at all." What did your party do? You put hides on the free list, and when you did it you discarded the advice, the acknowledgment, and the desire of these shoe manufacturers when they said you could place their products upon the free list.

And what do we find? In 1909 these gentlemen—the shoe manufacturers in this country—that you are protecting with a tariff tax sold abroad sole leather to the extent of $6,887,000; kid, $3,373,000; patent leather, $169,000; splits, $17,624,000; and other leather, $2,159,000; total, $30,304,000. They sold abroad boots and shoes, $10,305,000; harness, $650,600 worth; total, $41,367,600 worth of goods that these leather manufacturers and boot and shoe manufacturers are sending abroad and selling in competition with all the world; $41,000,000 worth of leather in 1909, including $10,000,000 worth of boots and shoes. And yet you gentlemen turn upon the American consumer who needs the boots and shoes, the farmer who needs the harness, who needs the leather, and say, "Notwithstanding they are able to sell $41,000,000 worth of these articles abroad in competition with the world, we will lay upon you the heavy hand of tariff taxation and make that much more flow into their pockets from the pockets of the mass of our people.

And I want to say here that these men did not understate the facts when they said: "If you will give us free hides we will compete with the world." I voted to give them free hides, and let us see how much they have increased their business. In not quite one year how much have they increased it? In 1910 instead of selling $6,887,000 worth of sole leather in foreign countries they sold $8,419,473 worth of sole leather. Instead of selling $3,673,000 worth of kid, glazed, they sold $16,675,000 worth. They sold a total of $51,123,000 worth of leather goods, as compared with $41,000,000, or an increase of $10,000,000 in foreign trade in one year under free hides. Why, the sale of these articles abroad is much greater than the entire sale of the United States in the early days of the Republic when the Republican Party was fighting for a protective tariff to protect our infant industries. The boot and shoe makers of this country sent abroad boots and shoes to the extent of $13,216,000, or an increase of $3,500,000 in the sale of boots and shoes as compared with last year. Why can they not sell them to the American consumer as cheaply as they can ship them across the ocean and sell them in competition with the world? Where did they sell them? They sold to Great Britain $4,400,000 worth of sole leather. They sold to Great Britain of other leathers $10,900,000, while all the other countries took $6,000,000 worth.

Now, the question I want answered, and you must answer it to justify your system that you are pursuing here, is this: If these men can ship this amount of goods, and they gladly do it, into foreign countries, and sell $51,000,000 in competition with the world, why can they not sell here to the American consumer without any protective tariff at all? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It will not do to undertake to answer this argument by saying that they are sold as cheaply here as abroad. That statement is untrue; that you have fought and are now fighting for a protective tariff shows it to be untrue. If they were sold as cheaply here as they are abroad, why would you ask for a protective tariff? If our manufacturers of shoes and harness and leather can pay the freight rates across the mighty deep and go into far-away Japan and China and Germany and England and France and Russia and lay down our leather goods in competition with the world, what have they to fear from competition from those countries upon their own soil? The very fact that they are fighting for this tariff shows that they are extorting higher prices from the American consumer than they get from the foreigner. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet your party after giving free hides for the benefit of these people turned and kept the tariff upon the finished article, and the tariff to-day is laid against every consumer in this country who purchases anything made out of leather.
